Western Germany's 4m engineering workers rejected a 3.3 per cent pay offer and prepared to add their weight to the wave of strikes already threatening chaos in public services next week. Franz Steinkühler, president of the iG Metall union, said the offer was meant as a provocation and would be treated as such. He called for "massive warning strikes" next week. Page 22; Bonn

Consumer confidence lifts hopes of slow UK recovery

and Peter Marsh

A RISE in consumer confidence and a sharp increase in import volumes have boosted prospects for a hesitant UK economic recovery later this year.

A survey of consumer confidence by Gallup, the market research company, showed that the balance of people expecting economic conditions to improve was the highest for five years. The poll was conducted immedi ately before and after the April 9 general election.

Meanwhile, Central Statistical Office figures showed the tipe underlying volume of imports grew by 3 per cent in the first quarter compared with the final three months of 1991.

However, underlying export growth over the period was flat, reflecting the slowdown in the world economy which might dampen the pace of a UK upturn. Other CSO figures showed that retail sales volumes in March fell to their lowest level for almost a year, but many in the City shrugged off the figures, arguing that they were distorted by elec-toral uncertainties and the late-

The Gallup poll, on behalf of the European Commission, showed that 42 per cent of those surveyed expected the economy to improve over the next 12 months, compared with only 20 per cent who were pessimistic. It also showed that the balance of consumers expecting their own financial position to improve over the next year was the highest since August 1987. Retail sales volume fell by 0.8 per cent in March compared with February, bringing the year-on-year decline to 3 per cent. In the three months to March sales

THINK SMALL

The Election result has boosted business confidence. The preconditions are in place for lower interest rates and an emergence from recession.

Smaller UK companies should now be particularly favoured. For the past three years the smaller companies sector has underperformed the UK stockmarket as a whole and astute investors may feel it is due for revaluation.

Smaller companies tend to derive much more of their sales and profits domestically than do larger ones, which tend to be internationally diversified. So they should be among the first to benefit from improving sentiment in the UK.

Mercury UK Smaller Companies Fund invests for capital growth in smaller companies with above-average growth prospects. With 120 fund managers in London and around £40 billion under management, Mercury is well placed to identify such companies.

Hong Kong welcomes some political clout

By Simon Davies

Legislative councillors said the new governor would be in a position to achieve more than his predecessor, because as friend and senior colleague of the prime minister and foreign secretary of Britain, Mr Patten should carry much more political clout.

There was concern at Mr Patten's lack of experience in Asia. But it was felt this might be balanced by the fact that his previous position in the government might encourage Beijing to treat him as a direct representative of the sovereign power, rather than just

"He is clearly someone who is held in high regard by the British govern-ment," said Mr Nigel Rich, managing director of Jardine Matheson. Mr Rich argued that in the period of transition leading up to the hand-over to China in 1997, "the skills of a politician will be very helpful".

Mr Martin Lee, leader of the United Democrats, the party which attracted majority support in Hong Kong's first direct elections last year, said he was cautiously optimistic. He said he hoped a politician would be more receptive to the will of the people

Mr Lee has complained that under Lord Wilson, a "group of yes men and women" was appointed "to thwart all our attempts to change policies and hetter the conditions of our people".

He said: "A politician may see the benefits of working with us, rather than against us. After all, who are the elected members?

Mr Lee was not concerned about Mr Patten's lack of knowledge of Asia. "Sometimes you have a China expert and you find a little knowledge is a dangerous thing. If he is a good politician, I am sure he will pick things up very quickly," he said. Mr Patten follows two Sinologists and diplomats to the post of governor, Lord Wilson and his predecessor Sir Edward Youde.

There was a strong feeling in the business community that Hong Kong had stood low on the political agenda in Britain, and that the appointment of one of the prime minister's close confidants as governor indicated a change of strategy.

Ms Rita Fan, a legislative council-lor, argued "I hope this will mean that Hong Kong will become more important on the political agenda," while Baroness Dunn, a member of the Executive Council, said Mr Patten was "highly respected for his political abilities. I am sure that his talents will be particularly useful to Hong Kong during these crucial years of political evolution."

But there will inevitably be voices of discontent. One pro-Beijing legislative councillor was concerned that Mr. Patten might give special treatment to British business interests, arguing that the Conservative party has long had close contacts with the local British business community.

This is a sensitive subject, following the award of most consultancy contracts for the new port and airport development scheme to local subsidiaries of UK companies, much to the ire of the local press.

Some newspapers have mirrored British Labour party accusations that the governorship was being handed to Mr Patten as a consolation prize after he lost his seat in the election. But the news is likely to have no impact on the local stock market, which was more concerned about the outcome of the British election, given the pronounced Tory leanings of the local business community and its obvious desire for stability.

"Mr Patten will need a very good support team," said Mr Barry Yates, research director of Asla Equity. "He is coming out to a part of the world with which he is not familiar. And politics out here is very different."

But some hoped that Mr Patten's arrival with little knowledge of local affairs will at least leave him open to new ideas. "We hope this is the begin-ning of a change in British policy towards China and Hongkong. So far this has been one of kow-towing to Beijing," said Mr Lee.

Bonn spurns US criticism of budget policy

By Quentin Peel in Bonn

THE German government yesterday angrily rejected US criticism of its swollen budget deficit, setting the scene for a sharp confrontation over the issue at this weekend's meeting of finance ministers from the Group of Seven industrialised nations. Separate statements yesterday by Mr Theo Waigel, the German finance minister, and Mr Horst Köhler, his state sec-retary and chief international negotiator, made it clear they regard the criticism as both untimely and unjustified.

Mr Köhler directly attacked Mr David Mulford, the US treasury secretary, for what he described as "one-sided and partially false judgments" on the state of the German budget

He rejected the US criticism as "unacceptable" on the eve of the G7 meeting, and quite contrary to the principle of G7 cooperation - that "every country should keep its own house

The structure of the court has been agreed between Britain and China, but Hong Kong is unhappy it was not

Other likely arguments stemming from the work of the Sino-British Joint Liaison Group include the future of military lands and air service agreements between Hong Kong and third countries.

World Bank ready to lend

By John Lloyd in Moscow

OIL prices in Russia are set to rise sharply in the middle of the year, pushing consumer prices up by 150 per cent, Mr Andrei Nechayev, economic minister, sald yesterday.

After a cabinet meeting in Moscow, he said the government would impose an effective ceiling of Rbs2,200 a tonne (with a floor of Rbs1,800), up from the present subsidised price of Rbs350 a tonne. Gas prices will also rise to Rbs1,100-1,600 per thousand cubic metres for all except domestic users, who will continue to pay the subsidised price of Rbs260. The rise of energy prices, the European nearer to HDTV agreement

EUROPEAN television manufacturers, broadcasters and satellite operators have indicated their willingness to develop high-definition television (HDTV) services in Europe, signing a joint declaration which the European Commission described yesterday as "a major step" towards advanced TV services, Andrew Hill writes

But the different interest groups have yet to agree a legallybinding memorandum of understanding. Such a document would commit the industry to a firm strategy and is essential to the Commission's plan to develop HDTV. The companies will meet again in May to discuss a revised text.

Aid pledge for Pakistan

Western donors yesterday pledged $2.3bn in new aid for Pakistan, to help it continue efforts to curb poverty while at the same carrying out ambitious economic reforms. William Dawkins reports from Paris. The package, which fell slightly short of the government's requests, was agreed at a two-day meeting of the World Bank Pakistan Consortium. Donors also earmarked $220m to belp feed and resettle some of the 3.5m Afghan refugees.

Debt write-down urged

A substantial write-down of the third world's debt to commercial banks was urged yesterday by the World Commission on Environ-ment and Development, which has spent three days in London debating the Earth Summit to be held in Rio de Janeiro in June. John Hunt reports. The commission said developing countries debts were forcing them to sacrifice environmental assets.

Key Polish vote delayed

Poland's centre-right minority government won a reprieve yesterday when parliament put off for two weeks a crucial vote on public sector pay which threatened to rekindle hyper-inflation, Christopher Bobinski reports from Warsaw.

Mr Andrzej Olechowski, the finance minister, had threatened to resign if the government did not receive the 75 per cent support it needed to block an earlier court decision which called on the government to reimburse public servants and pensioners for income cuts imposed last year.

Meanwhile the latest foreign trade figures show a marked improvement in Poland's trade surplus and the first success for the government's policy of raising export competitiveness through devaluation. Over the first three months exports rose to $3.3bn and imports fell to $2.9bn to give a surplus of $385m compared to a small deficit in the first quarter of 1991.

EC to seek farm fraud funds

The European Commission will seek to recover some Ecu5m (£3.55m) paid in bogus farm export subsidies to Bord Bainne, the Irish dairy export board, and to DMK, a German trading company, EC officials said yesterday, Our Foreign Staff reports.

They said recovery of the bogus subsidies, uncovered after an EC Court of Auditors report earlier this week, should take the normal form, with the governments in question - Ireland and Germany - being asked to get the money back from the companies, and then turning it over to Brussels.

Andreotti steps down as Italian PM

By Halg Simonian in Milan

FORMATION of a new Italian government moved a step closer yesterday following the resignation of Mr Giulio Andreotti as premier.

The timing of Mr Andreotti's resignation had appeared in doubt, as a result of delays on Thursday in electing new lead-ers of the Senate and Chamber of Deputies following this month's general election. After two rounds of voting yesterday, Mr Giovanni Spa-dolini, of the Republican party, was re-elected president of the Senate. In the Chamber of Deputies, it took three votes to produce a majority for Mr Oscar Luigi Scalfaro, a veteran Christian Democrat.

The nomination of the new parliamentary leaders had come the subject of intense debate as a result of the new political balance following the general election. The polls revealed sharply lower support for the Christian Democrats, still Italy's largest party, and their Socialist allies in the previous coalition government. The main parties will face more problems in stitching together a new government. asthe previous four-party coalition will probably have to

"The Austrian economy has continued to do well in terms of all major macroeconomic performance indicators: growth, employment and external and internal financial stability," the report concludes.

While exports have declined with the slump in demand from Germany, tourism earnings have remained high. Domestic investment, especially in construction, has been resilient despite higher interest rates caused by the firm link between the Austrian schilling and the D-Mark. Ethnic rivalries overshadow Afghan peace

Mr Benon Sevan, the UN spe-cial envoy on Afghanistan, has been shuttling back and forth from Pakistan to negotiate the setting up of an interim mujahideen-dominated administration to take over from the communist regime in Kabul, which has virtually collapsed in the wake of the overthrow 10 days ago of former President Najibullah. But Mr Sevan has also warned the guerrilla leaders of the dangers of anarchy and civil war if they continue to pursue ethnic and personal

Over the last week all the main provincial cities including Mazar-i-Sharif, Herat, Kandahar, and yesterday Jalalabad - have been taken over in bloodless coups by different coalitions of mujahideen groups co-operating with local army commanders. The overthrow of the hardline communist rule that remained in power after the Russians left two years ago has thus so far gone remarkably smoothly.

All week there have been scenes of apparent reconciliation between mujahideen guerrillas and the army and security forces they have been fighting for so long. At Charikar, north of Kabul, the temporary headquarters of the northern-based coalition, Shah Ahmed Masood, the main guerrilla leader, warmly embraced General Abdul Majid, the deputy commander of an Uzbek militia force that Mr Najibullah used for his most brutal offensives. They met in a garden of almond and apple blossom.

The local accords on a transfer of power outside Kabul seemed to have been matched the fate of the capital - both the largest city and the one where the ethnic mix is the greatest - and over the setting day's agreement appears to end the squabbling between guerrilla commanders and the political organisations based in Peshawar over how to fill the vacuum in the capital and in the running of the country.

Mr Masood's strategy all week has been to hold back from entering Kabul to allow time for an interim administration to be formed. But he desperately needs Pushtun leaders to step forward. The pressures for some form of accommodation are strong. Street opinion in Kabul is uniformly against further fighting. A diplomat says: "The overriding sentiment is a craving for peace. Nobody is in the mood to fight." Pakistan seems to be reining in the belligerence of Mr Hekmatyar. The international community is exerting pressure through the UN with ros-Ghali, the secretary gen-eral, in Pakistan yesterday.

The question now is whether the interim administration can hold the country together. Even among Uzbeks of the north, the goal remains Afghan unity rather than secession. The central Asian republics of the former Soviet Union, Iran, and Pakistan are all in favour of preserving the geographical status quo of Afghanistan and preventing the break-up of the

Iraq told to name nuclear suppliers

UNITED Nations nuclear inspectors say Iraq must reveal how it procured vital material and equipment used in its nuclear weapons programme before there is any chance of declaring Baghdad in compli-ance with UN Gulf war ceasefire terms.

In particular, UN inspectors say Iraq must explain where it acquired 100 tonnes of maraging steel, a special alloy used in construction of uranium enrichment centrifuges, and 20 carbon fibre rotors, also used in the enrichment process.

of the UN team investigating Iraq's nuclear programme, said he was seeking assistance from countries or companies which might have supplied these.

He said Iraq must also iden-tify the technical specialists who advised Baghdad on its advanced nuclear programme. The UN inspectors believe that a handful of key foreign specialists, possibly retired from the nuclear industry, provided Iraq with technical expertise. The Italian scientist, based in the International Atomic Energy Agency headquarters in Vienna, said that until his inspectors had a clear idea of Iraq's procurement system, they could never be confident that they had uncovered the full extent of Iraq's nuclear weapons-building programme.

He said that despite Iraq's improved co-operation with UN inspectors, some important inconsistencies remained in what had so far been either uncovered or revealed.

Mr Zifferero nevertheless said he was satisfied with the co-operation of Iraqi officials during the 11th and latest UN nuclear inspection mission to Iraq, which oversaw destruction of buildings in the Al Atheer complex south of Baghdad, said to be central to development of an enriched uranium weapon.

However, he said Iraq was still "stonewalling" on its procurement programme.

EC disputes Japanese claim on car export curbs

By Andrew Hill in Brussels and Steven Butler in Tokyo

JAPAN has agreed to cut car and light commercial vehicle exports to the EC by 6 per cent this year, Brussels officials said yesterday, contradicting EC and Japanese officials in Tokyo who said the cut was likely to be 1.5 to 2 per cent.

A senior Commission official in Brussels said the EC would never have accepted a cut of 2 per cent. Officially, neither side will discuss the specific terms of the agreement, which involves Japan "monitoring" its exports to the EC, but there was confusion about the implications of the deal, reflecting the sensitivity of the issue.

The key thing here is that the Japanese have accepted to reduce exports, said Mr for the delegation of the EC in Tokyo.

An official of the vehicle division of Japan's Ministry of International Trade and Industry said: "The EC and Japan both recognise that demand in the EC will decline by 1.5 to 2 per cent compared to 1991. Japan will monitor car exports so as not to cause market dis-

The official said that the agreement was made taking into account the difficulties of European vehicle makers, and that it would be desirable for Japanese exports to decline by slightly more than the contraction of the market.

But it was maintained in Brussels yesterday that Japa-nese exports of cars and light commercial vehicles would fall by 75,000 units to 1.185m this year - a drop of 6 per cent from 1.26m last year. The Japanese share of the EC car and light commercial vehicle mar-ket would fall to 11 per cent this year from 11.3 per cent last year. Earlier, the Japanese authorities had appeared surprised by reports out of Brussels that they might reduce exports by 5 per cent.

Yanase, Japan's biggest imported car dealer, was unhappy at the prospect of los-ing its near-exclusive sales of Volkswagen models and will attempt to replace Volkswagen sales with other cars, possibly from Opel the German subsidiary of General Motors.

The 1992 agreement is the last before a longer-term agreement comes into force, with the aim of opening the Community market gradually between 1993 and 1999. The 1993-99 deal is a similar "gen-tleman's agreement" and like this week's accord - was called into question almost as soon as it had been made.

how much relief the Japanese export curbs will bring them, as production by Japanese manufacturers in the UK is to increase. European production by Japanese companies is not covered by either accord.

Meanwhile, a unilateral decision by the Japanese government to cut export quotas to the US has been condemned in the US as inadequate. Japanese exports to the US have declined steadily in recent years, but have been more than replaced by increased local production.

The exports cuts are likely to prevent Japanese makers from boosting exports at a time when the domestic market is declining. The Japan Automo-bile Manufacturers Association yesterday reported that vehicle production in the year to last month fell by 3.3 per cent, the first decline in five years. While exports remained stable, domestic demand fell 4.8 per

A New Fund For Smaller UK Companies.

At Perpetual, we're confident that smaller UK companies are poised for a period of growth. That's why we're launching the Perpetual UK Smaller Companies Fund, which will concentrate on prime performers worth up to £200 million.

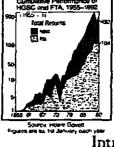

Just like UK smaller companies, Perpetual's history of performance is particularly successful. Our UK Department already enjoys a top-quartile ranking for its UK Growth Fund since launch - just part of Perpetual's impressive track record which culminated in our being awarded The Sunday Times International Unit Trust Manager of the Year in 1991

Smaller Companies. Big Potential.

Why do smaller companies have such potential? For one thing, they are inherently flexible. They can adapt positively to changes and developments in consumer demand, altering their approach more readily than unwieldy larger contenders For another, smaller companies mean smaller overheads, Indeed many have entered the post-election period armed with significant cash resources. And of course, smaller companies have strong potential for rapid growth - particularly in a positive economic climate Powerful Performance.

If you look at the performance history of smaller UK companies, the facts speak for themselves. Over the last 37 years, the Hoare Govett Smaller Companies Index, which mainly covers companies worth up to £200 million, has outperformed the FT All Share Index by an average of 4.5%

Opec agrees to hold output ceilings

By Mark Nicholson in Vienna

OIL ministers from the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries (Opec) decided yesterday to leave untouched a nominal output ceiling of 22.96m barrels a day for the second quarter, pro-nounced at their last meeting in February, after slight recent firming of crude prices.

However, Dr Subroto, Opec secretary general, said after the ministers' meeting in Vienna they had agreed that tion "should implement the agreement" - a nod in the direction of Iran, which has been producing 3.4m b/d rather than its allocation of 3.2m b/d. Although some members, notably Iran and Algeria, had entered the meeting urging further output cuts, ministers settled for a reiteration of the February limit, encouraged by the slight firming of prices which Mr Hisham Nazer, the Saudi Arabian oil minister described as "a good omen".

Dr Subroto said Opec output

for March was 28.2m b/d, "very close" to the February ceiling which was lowered from post-Gulf war output levels of 23.65m b/d in an effort to shore up softening crude prices. This, he said, had been achieved, citing the rise in the price for the Opec basket of crudes from $16.39 in early March to $17.73 in early April

Labour candidates set for horse-trading

By David Owen and David Goodhart

LABOUR was yesterday preparing for a flurry of political horse-trading over the support from MPs that candidates for the party leadership need to secure their nominations with MPs returning to Westminster on Monday.

Last night an aide of Mr Bryan Gould, who is contesting the leadership and the deputy's post, said the shadow environment secretary was just short of the nominations required on both counts.

Candidates require the nominations of a fifth of the parliamentary Labour party. Last night the only people all but assured of the 55 signatures needed were Mr John Smith, the odds-on favourite to succeed Mr Neil Kinnock as leader, and Mrs Margaret Beckett, one of the front-runners for deputv leader.

The task of getting 55 signatures has been made more difficult by the reluctance of many of the 69 new Labour MPs more than a quarter of the parliamentary party - to nomi-nate any candidate until they know them better.

Nominations must be submitted to the party's Walworth Road headquarters in south London by Tuesday evening. Each MP may nominate only one candidate - but those who have already made a nomination may withdraw it and sub-

to be Tory chairman

SIR Norman Fowler, a former cabinet minister and Mr John Major's "minder" during the election campaign, is odds-on favourite to succeed Mr Chris Patten as Tory party chairman.

Mr Major is said to share Mr Patten's belief that the job should go to a political heavyweight instead of - as sometimes happens just after an election - a "caretaker". Sir Norman resigned from

Mrs Thatcher's administration early in 1990 to spend more time with his family after a long cabinet career, but has remained active as a senior backbencher at Westminster. An announcement is expected soon, although Mr Patten will stay on until after next month's local elections before taking up his post as governor of Hong Kong in July. Mr Jeffrey Archer, the author and former deputy chairman, who played a vigorous role in the Tory election campaign and has been tireless in his work for the party, is said to be a contender. Another candidate who has been mentioned is Dame Angela Rumbold, who became the party's deputy chairman and a privy councillor in the post-election reshuffle.

The party chairman is neces sarily someone who enjoys the prime minister's trust, but the post does not carry automatic cabinet rank.

Since he left the cabinet Sir Norman has become a nonexecutive director of NFC, the transport company, and Evered Bardon, the quarry products group.

Mr Patten is said to believe there are important and strate-gic decisions to be taken over the next three to four years, not least in reducing the party's overdraft. He is also believed to be confident that the organisation was effective during the election campaign, for example in the targeting of Wandsworth's bid - one of more than 60 submitted to the Department of the Environment - includes £3m to improve pre-school education, upgrade three primary schools in Battersea as selective "junior technology colleges", and establish a state "prep" school on the site of Battersea Technology College.

The BBC1 Troubleshooter series Sterling's sharp rise since the Conservative general election victory has prompted speculation that the UK might soon place the pound in the narrow band of the European exchange rate mechanism

ERM is a system for keeping the main European currencies within set limits of each other. The idea of that is to promote monetary stability across Europe and to keep inflation low. In the ERM there are two approaches to tying currencies to each other, based either on narrow or broad bands. Seven of the 10 currencies in the system - including the D-Mark and the French franc - are allowed to fluctuate within narrow. 2.25 per cent bands in relation to each other. The other three - sterling, the Portuguese escudo and the Span-ish peseta – have broad, 6 per

Why is the KRM important? Mr Norman Lamont, the chancellor, has made the ERM the central feature of UK macroeconomic policy. It is based on keeping the pound within set limits of the D-Mark, which is regarded as the core currency of the system. That is because the German currency is still considered the least likely within the ERM to lose its value over the longer term. even though the D-Mark has been under pressure during the past year due to inflation resulting from reunification. > Why is Britain now in the broad band? Currencies face all sorts of pressures on financial markets, which mean they can go up or down depending on economic events. Broad bands provide greater leeway for currencies to gain or lose value against the others. When Britain entered the ERM 19 months ago it thought a narrow band would be too restrictive. Mr Lamont, however, has said that the UK will join the narrow band at some point.

> Why the speculation about entering the narrow band? Since the election, sterling has penefited from a surge in buying from international investors. Mr Siliars said he was not giving up the deputy leadership of the SNP, but had no immediate desire to return to Westminster.

He said that the drive by opposition parties to secure a multi-option referendum on Scotland's constitutional future was a post-election pla-cebo - it was dishonest to pretend that Scots would win devolution in such a way. The revival of the Scottish Conservative party would continue at the next general election.

The strength of popular demand for a referendum will be tested tomorrow when Scotland United, the newly formed grouping of all non-Conservative parties, holds a rally in Glasgow. It hopes to attract more than the 3,000 to 4,000 people who attended its first rally on the Sunday after the

If the pound looked as if it would rise or fall outside those limits, then under the system's rules central banks from the ERM nations would be forced to sell or buy pounds to keep it in place. How would it help Britain? It would reduce the amount by which sterling can fall against the D-Mark without triggering official action. The theory is that the implicit support for

So what? This is where we get on to interest rates. Assuming the theory worked, Britain would be able to cut interest rates, which have been held at 10.5 per cent since September, without causing international investors to sell sterling.

Can we assume, then, that a narrow band would lead to lower UK rates? Not quite. A key issue is the high level of short-term German interest rates, at present 9.75 per cent. Via the ERM link, those deter-

Prospects for Majornomics

the late Sam Goldwyn might have put it. This will certainly be a strong feeling among the finance ministers gathering in Washington for the Group of Seven this week. They will look at an IMF economic forecast - growth, but not just yet - in which only the dates seem to have been changed since last year, and wonder why they should believe it this time. They will bear the familiar American call for economic stimulation, and will no doubt offend Mr Nicholas Brady by giving the usual answers about inflationary

This provides a rather grey setting for Britain's triumphantly grey prime minister, Mr John Major. He would not ask for anything more stimulating, for nobody hates inflation more than he does. His view will be influential, for his prestige among his foreign colleagues is much enhanced. It is now based on achievement rather than promise, and enviable achievement at that: he is the one statesman in the world who has managed to retain popular support while disinflating the economy.

His prestige certainly goes a long way, too, to explain the extraordinary surge in sterling last week - a natural response to the end of political uncertainty, but also something more. The historic parallel here is a little more distant: it is a decade since another likeable advocate of the free market first inherited a savage monetary source, and then sought to revive the economy through massive public borrowing. The markets loved Mr Rea-

The irresistible rise of the dollar from 1982 to early 1985 was propelled by the developing country debt crisis. For worried investors, the American promise of high real interest rates for lending to a sound, politically stable economy was irresistible. Foreign investors eagerly bought the bonds issued to finance a national deficit which had been denounced as ruinous and presponsible. (Did Mr Peter Peterson, the most insistent Thatcher during her US visit two weeks ago?) Foreign investors went on to drive up an undervalued equity market. What went up did in the end come down - but the current account should in therelatively smoothly, and years

The British are a self-deprecating race, so readers may find the idea of a ish altogether for half of 1993. ilight into sterling bizarre. But if you compare British consensus and consolidation with German inflation and the threat of strikes, or Mr Major's secure position with that of President Mitterrand - or even President Bush - it is not so implausible.

For the Japanese, still the world's main savers, the appeal is especially strong. This line of thought leads on seductively. British equities look significantly undervalued, compared at least with Wali Street. A full replay of the Reagan experience would be a heady prospect for British investors. It is time, before optimism gets out of hand, to list the differences between Reaganomics and the choices open to Mr Major.

Currency gains

The most obvious is that while the dollar floats freely against the other leading currencies - and in the end sank pretty freely - sterling's movements are constrained Since investors tend to factor in currency gains with market gains, this should ensure that sterling securities are less internationally volatile than dollar securities, and so calm things down. More important, Mr Major does not share Mr Reagan's comforting beliefs that deficits don't matter, and can in any case be reduced by cutting taxes. He will pursue a more con ventional path, again with less dramatic results. Finally, Mr Reagan had the luck to share a world boom: Mr Major's prospects are

All the same, they are favourable in many ways, and enviable in some. The pain of the recession has produced real gains in effi-ciency, so British competitiveness looks stronger (and German much weaker) than seemed likely when sterling's ERM central rate was first chosen. British employment costs are especially attractive within Europe, thanks to comparatively low social charges and favourable demographics. Substantial inward investment is likely to persist, providing jobs and future export growth, even if European growth is undynamic.

This inward flow will help, too, to finance the British current account deficit - indeed, as the US government used to argue, a current deficit is the accounting counterpart of a foreign inflow This is still the most awkward corner Mr Major faces: for although ory be a mere memorandum item in a world of free capital move-The parallels are quite striking. ments, a big deficit can still of foreign capital equipment threaten such frights. about it: Mr Christopher Patten will be a heavyweight gover-nor of Hong Kong. When it comes to matters Chinese he is, however, an inexperienced heavyweight, a high-powered inno-cent abroad. Will he outwit the dragon, or will it gobble him up? As he sets out for fittings for a plumed hat and other gubernatorial fancy dress he may reflect upon the strengths he takes to the job. His contacts in Whitehall are as good as

- some say better than - those of most ministers in Mr John Major's cabinet. When he speaks the people of Hong Kong will know that what he says has the backing of the prime minister and the foreign secretary. When he negotiates with the Chinese they will soon see that there is nothing to be gained by trying to shift disputed items up a rung to Downing Street.

Mr Patten's ties with the foreign secretary, Mr Douglas Hurd, go back to when they both served in the Conservative research depart-ment in the late 1960s. They worked together when Mr Hurd was political secretary to the then Mr Edward Heath and again at the Northern Ireland office in the early 1980s. In 1986, as the Westland helicopter affair blew itself out, Mr Patten and a group of like-minded ministers told Mr Hurd that "should the No 11 bus come along" - that is, should Mrs Margaret Thatcher be struck down - they would campaign to make him her successor. That is exactly what he and his friends did when the No 11 hit home in November 1990. The new governor's close relationship with the prime minister is of more recent vintage. When Mr Patten was a parliamentary secretary in the Northern Ireland office in 1984 he became acquainted with Mr Major, then a freshly-minted junior government whip. "That is the most talented man of my generation," he told a friend. The well-hidden man of talent eventually joined the "blue chip group", a dining club founded by Mr Tristan Garel-Jones, a foreign office minister, and our hero, among others. During his 17 months as chairman of the Conservative party Mr Patten and Mr Major have come to know one another well; the successful outcome of the election puts the latter in the former's debt. These advantages should allay the doubts of those Hong Kong residents who ask, with some justification, what credentials Mr Patten has for the job, other than a sense of deep disappointment at losing his seat in Bath. He is very upset; he came to regard both the constituency and his delightful nearby cottage, a converted chapel, with especial affection. But Mr Patten has always kept a place in his dreams for what he calls "life after politics", even imagining himself, at times when his fancy takes flight, as perhaps a future president of the World Bank, or head of a United Nations development agency.

Such fantasy appointments enable him to picture himself helping to develop the Third World on a some success, although on a small scale, as minister for overseas development in 1986-89. He won the ODA a budget increase of 7 per cent in real terms - and he did it while Mrs Thatcher was still prime minister. "That's big potatoes," he said, boosting Britain's minuscule aid budget as best he could. But Hone Kong is not Third World: it is in a growing and rampant first world corner of Asia. Mr Patten has never regarded his ambitions as forever confined to the British isles, but there is no evidence that he knows much of Hong Kong, or Chinese, or

He is, however, a quick study. In spite of a robust social round at university he managed a good second in history at Balliol College Oxford. He is widely respected for his intelligence, his willingness to entertain all manner of ideas and persons, and, latterly, his political ruthlessness. The image of "cuddly Chris" has been destroyed by his hard-nosed management of the election campaign. What is revealed is a rapidly matured 48-year-old politician of unquestioned ability and fine imagination whose principal qualifications, listed above, derive from the fact that he has practised no other art than politics since he left university.

His first big conundrum will be whether to break with all that. If he to win the allegiance of Hong businessmen he must demonstrate that he sees himself as the protector of the colony's interests, even where those conflict with Britain's. But how can he - he who is above all chum and confidant of the prime minister and foreign secretary? The man who, as secretary for the envi-ronment, administered Mrs Thatcher's poll tax while regarding it as a disaster may find a way.

It will, however, be difficult. Mr Patten's greatest domestic challenge is to ensure that institutions which protect the interests of Hong Kong's citizens and busines an independent judiciary, a partially elected legislature, and a free press - are firmly rooted; his greatest foreign policy challenge is to convince the Chinese government that it is in their interests that he

he framework is there, at least on paper. There are two basic documents, the September 1984 Anglo-Chinese ioint declaration, and the Basic Law - drafted by the Chinese and passed by their legislature in 1990. Neither is perfect but both legitimise the concept of "one country, two systems" and provide for a high degree of autonomy for Hong Kong after its reversion to Chinese sovereignty on July 1 1997.

The colony's vibrant economy is for which it is justly famed. Real growth this year is expected to accelerate to 5 per cent from 4 per cent in 1991. Hong Kong's economic integration with southern China principally Guangdong where strong ties of family and dialect exist - is proceeding at an aston-ishing rate. The local bourse is the best performing leading stock market in the world. This is the golden goose that it is in everyone's interest - Britain's, Hong Kong's, and China's – to keep alive. The trick can be done by a skilful political operator, which Mr Patten happens to be. But he will need many skills. The administration he will take over lacks firm leadership. The civil service employs capable officials but is demoralised. Like the executive, it is struggling to come to terms with the introduction of limited democracy.

This needs some explaining. The colony's legislative council, (LegCo), has 60 members, 18 elected by popular vote. Most of the 18 returned in last September's poll support Mr Martin Lee, the leader of the United Democrats. Like Mr Patten, Mr Lee is a devout Catholic; unlike him he is driven by conviction, and hence regarded by the present administra-tion as inflexible. Thus the Hong Kong government has acted as if the elections never happened. Mr Lee's supporters have been obliged to adopt the role of an opposition. risk bringing Mr Lee and his assoclates into the Executive Council, or ExCo. The sticking point for the present governor, Lord Wilson, was Mr Lee's refusal to accept collective responsibility, although he said he would abide by secrecy. Yet this is only an issue if the governor makes it one; the rules of government are not immutable nor are they universally observed. Mr Patten will anyway have to get to know the personalities in LegCo quickly. The council has to approve government expenditure; it can amend bills; and it may scrutinise government decisions. A sure touch with LegCo might be the least that Mr Major, ever the Whip, could expect of his new governor-general.

That achieved, Mr Patten will face the not unfamiliar question of electoral reform. He has it within his gift to gerrymander, when he negotiates the details of the new electoral system to be put in place by 1995 under the existing agree-ments. He should resist the temptation. He will be told that the people of Hong Kong are not interested in democracy, that all they want is a quiet, prosperous life. He will also be told that Mr Lee is increasingly unpopular. This can be put to the test in 1995; how fairly will depend upon the new electoral system. Mr Patten has two tasks here. First, he must make the right choice: 20 representatives elected in 20 seats by one-person-one-vote is best. Then he must get China to agree. He must somehow persuade Beijing that a Hong Kong which recognises a plurality of views is most likely, in the long run, to retain the confidence of its people and their commitment to elations between Britain, its Hong Kong dependency and China have been slowly but painfully recovering since the rupture of June 4 1989. But the "big atmosphere", as the Chinese call it, is still poor. China is deeply suspicious of British intentions. In its view Britain aims to maximise the commercial benefits to itself (through projects such as the $HK114bn airport) and at the same time lay down structures that will perpetuate British influence beyond 1997.

Beijing's counter is the Chinese water torture: an incessant drip, drip, drip of interference in domestic affairs. Its spokesmen now regularly comment on the colony's activities in a manner calculated to undermine the government's authority. Recently, without prior consultation, China appointed 44 Hong Kong worthies to advise it on Hong Kong matters.

The relationship with China is managed by the governor through intermediaries, notably the Anglo-Chinese Joint Liaison Group (JLG) which negotiates the detail of the hand over. He also has regular contact with Lu Ping, head of the Hong Kong and Macao Affairs Office of the State Council, who reports directly to Li Peng, China's current prime minister. But what does this mean for the colony? The current power struggle in Beijing is not helping. The natural tendency of Chinese officials is to keep their heads down and wait to see which faction emerges triumphant.

It is hardly surprising that little progress is being made in the JLG. Negotiations over air service agreements between Hong Kong and third countries and the future of British military land in the colony are proceeding at a snail's pace. Trivial matters such as a plan to caster have been allowed to get out of hand. There is a growing backlog of work relating to Hong Kong's exfernal relations: some 400 treaties have to be changed to account for Hong Kong's post-1997 status.

In short, the dragon Mr Patten will set out to tame is many-headed. possessed of ancient wisdom, and strengthened by an accretion over the centuries of an infinite patience. We will only know he can do it if he

MAN IN THE NEWS: John Cahill

Trench fighter in the cockpit

he inscription on the has been rock bottom. bulky grandfather clock in BTR's boardroom sums up the simple philosophy of Mr John Cahill, the industrial conglomerate's former chief executive: "Think of rest ... and work

Mr Cahill, 61, was forced to step down last year after reaching BTR's mandatory retirement age of 60. Instead of taking life easy in his homes in Rhode Island, Florida and London, reading 18th-century English history, listening to classical music or playing tennis - all of which he likes - he has just agreed to take on probably the most difficult job in British industry.

As the new full-time chairman of British Aerospace, he faces the daunting task of rebuilding the badly dented reputation of the country's biggest exporter of manufactured goods and restoring a sense of direction to the group.

When he was running BTR, he once warned the 1990s would be a tough decade. "The dinosaurs will roll over and die and the people who will survive will be the ones who offer good service and have a good cost base," he said. For BAe, the 1990s have so far been tougher than for most other groups. The company has been battered by the cyclical decline in its commercial aerospace, cars and property and construction businesses while its core military activities have been hit by post Cold War defence spending cuts. Since its flopped £432m rights issue, the subsequent boardroom coup and the ousting of the then chairman. Professor Sir Roland Smith, last September, morale inside the company chief executive, and the board.

With one foot still in plaster following a fall six weeks ago, Mr Cahill seemed anxious on Thursday to get down to work. "The man was not designed to relax," says one of his former BTR associates. "He is a very bad retiree and he doesn't like holidays."

Lean and long, with an urbane, soft-spoken manner, Mr Cahili has always had the reputation of a workaholic. He has already spent time studying BAe and its current operations. Before accepting the job of chairman, he took independent soundings of the state of the company. "He came to see me and I gave him a pretty grim exposé of BAe's problems. I thought he would never accept the job after what I told him," says an aerospace consul-

But the job offers Mr Cahill a big opportunity to turn BAe around. As an outsider, and someone who has never been part of the "old boy" network, he can take a fresh look at the company's problems and engineer its restructuring. "He's nobody's fool. He thinks on his feet and he will undoubtedly take a hands on approach to the business," says a City banker. There is a question mark, however, on how much freedom he will have to introduce new strategies. One of the conditions set by BAe for the job was that the new chairman had to work closely with the company's existing top management team to pursue the broad policy objectives set out in last year's ill-fated rights issue document. Mr Cahill confirmed he intended to work with Mr Dick Evans, BAe

Tough decisions will have to be taken on restructuring and these are likely to provoke tensions inside the company. But Mr Cahill appears relatively optimistic and says: "I understand the philosophy of the industry; I don't regard aerospace as a 'has been' business but a healthy one."

The new BAe chairman is an old-fashioned capitalist in the American managerial mould. He describes himself as "a factory man". He is not flash, wears under-stated suits and quiet ties and he dislikes ostentation — a trait that is in the parsimonious tradition of

His business credo is, in a nutshell, to keep a constant tight grip on costs while improving operational and financial efficiency. "I'm a trench fighter," he once said.

After leaving school, he worked for a few years in the City as a stockbroker and then became a salesman peddling fancy goods. He joined BTR - then the Birmingham Tyre and Rubber Company - as a management trainee when he was

25. He worked there until last year with long spells in the US. He rose to become chief executive in 1987. Even after taking charge of BAe, he is maintaining his ties with BTR as a director

But for all his rock-solid industrial background, Mr Cahill will single-minded dedication to business if he is to make a success of his five-year term at BAe. Although regarded as a very good operational valve company more efficient," remarks an engineering industry analyst), some doubt whether he will have the necessary vision to deal with the strategic issues facing

These include the need to find international partners for many of the group's diverse activities, sell or dispose of other components of the company and ultimately decide whether to retain the property and car businesses or simply refocus the company around defence and aero-

Mr Cahill conceded this week that he was not a political animal and suggested it was Mr Evans who had the political contacts. But it is diffiapolitical as chairman of a company whose primary customers are gov-ernments throughout the world the UK's and Saudi Arabia's chief

He will also have to prove he can be number one. Although chief executive, he was always overshadowed at BTR by Sir Owen Green, the chairman With his appointment, BAe has picked a man with a proven record as a chief executive. The irony would be to see his arrival create a chief executive triumvirate at the top of the company consisting of Mr Cahill, Mr Evans and Mr George Simpson, BAe's recently appointed deputy chief executive. That would leave the company still looking for a chairman.

Over the past six months, it has dawned on policymakers that the world economic structure of the 1980s, which the G7-- the US, Japan, Germany, France, Italy, the UK and Canada - could dominate, is no more. Nobody pretended it was an ideal economic order. But the G7 participants knew enough of each other's temperaments and goals to avoid damaging, public rows most of the time and occasionally to attempt ambitious schemes for Western policymakers are no longer able to assess accurately the import of three distinct economic developments: Nobody knows what is happening to the Russian econ-omy: whether its precipitate decline in activity is approaching bottom or whether more misery lies ahead.

countries have for their own economic progress? And how far will the G7 finance ministers and central bankers be prepared to go to provide aid for Russia? Mr Nicholas Brady, the US treasury secretary, said last week that he thought the Russian reform programme was intact. But nobody in western finance ministries or central banks has a clear idea of what Russian monetary policy constitutes.

One example of confusion is the Russian attitude towards currency stability. Reports this week have suggested that the Russian government wants to adopt a "crawling peg" system of adjustable exchange rates for the rouble. If that is the case, there will be no point in the west's discussing a $6bn stabilisation fund for the rouble at the G7 meeting tomorrow and at the meeting of ministers and central bankers from the Group of 10 big industrial countries on Monday.

Although the west welcomes Russia and other former Soviet republics into the world of free markets, G7 officials have serious misgivings about committing their taxpayers to largescale financial support. As a senior official muttered this week: "What if Russia is just a bigger and endless version of eastern Germany?"

There are worse scenarios: what if Russia and some of its neighbours fall prey to the same destructive trends that have plunged the former Yugoslav republics into civil war? Unanswered questions also remain over the possible damage that Tokyo's stock price slide could wreak. The lessons of the US, UK and Canada are that such asset price deflation heightens the risk of spectacular corporate failures. In Japan's case, it is easy to imagine growing problems for the country's banks when their capital bases have already been eroded by losses on large shareholdings, and more difficult borrowing conditions for clients of these banks

Confidence in Japan would be greater if the government were more effective or more transparent. But G7 officials admit that it is difficult to gain an insight into the workings of the weak and scandal-prone administration of Mr Kiichi

These deep-seated worries throw the IMF's latest forecast of lacklustre 1.4 per cent growth in the world economy this year into sharp relief. The problems of Germany, Russia, Japan and the rest of the industrialised world would be easier to contemplate if growth were more assured.

Whether these concerns surface in the final communiqués of the G7 or the other meetings in Washington this week is open to doubt. Interesting discussions in such forums tend to produce bland statements.

But the increased difficulty of managing the world economy cannot be held off the international agenda, and will be ripe for discussion at the Munich World Economic Summit of G7 leaders in July.

osmology is in a ferment this weekend, as scientists / study the first pictures ever received of the young universe; expanding out of the Big Bang which created everything about 15bn years ago.

The observations, made from space by a US satellite, show gigantic ripples of matter forming from the original cosmic fireball. These are by far the earliest signs of the "lumpiness" of the universe, which gravity was later to pull together into galaxies, stars, planets and the objects familiar from life on earth.

The significance of the discovery, announced on Thursday, may not match some of yesterday's fevered newspaper headlines, which suggested that the "riddle of the universe" was now solved. Even so, it is the most important event in cosmology since 1964, when scientists detected microwave radiation coming uniformly from all parts of the sky - a faint after-glow left over from the Big Bang itself.

That evidence convinced most cosmologists that the Big Bang theory of the universe was broadly correct and discredited the rival. Steady State theory. But it left several mysteries. How could everything become so evenly mixed in the instant following the Big Bang? And how could this evenly distributed matter then clump together?

result of 800m observations made over the course of a year by Nasa's Cosmic Background Explorer satellite (Cobe) - will help cosmologists

Cobe has found variations in the cosmic background radiation which had previously seemed to come so evenly from all directions. Analysis by computer proves that these are genuine fluctuations in the afterglow from the Big Bang, rather than distortions caused by radiation from astronomical objects.

Clive Cookson explains the latest cosmic discovery

the universe was 1bn years old or less than 10 per cent of its present age. Cobe has in effect taken a huge leap back in time to a universe 0.002 per cent of its present age.

It may be impossible ever to "see" further into the past than that: when the universe was less than 300,000 years old it was too dense to allow radiation to escape. But scientists will use Cobe's observations - which will become sharper as the satellite spends more time in orbit - to extrapolate back to within a tiny fraction of a second of the Big Bang.

Nasa scientists say the first fuzzy pictures from Cobe agree with a version of the Big Bang theory known as "inflationary cosmology". It postulates that the universe had a burst of unbelievably rapid expansion - faster even than the speed of light - during a period lasting less than one trillionth of a second, immediately after its creation.

All the fundamental particles and forces we know today originated during this inflationary micro-period. At the same time, minute fluctuations in the density of matter arose, leading to the cosmic ripples seen by Cobe and eventually the uneven universe in which we live. The Cobe observations also support the widely held theory that the familiar objects seen by astronomers - galaxies, stars, planets, quasars, interstellar dust clouds and so on - make up less than 10 per cent and perhaps as little as 1 per cent of all material in the universe today. This is because the amount of gravity provided by the visible fluctuations is not nearly enough to pull together galaxies and clusters of galaxies.

The remainder of the universe consists of mysterious "dark matter". Mr Edward Wright, a Cobe scientist from the University of California, said this "must be a new kind of matter, not yet detected. We need such invisible matter to explain how galaxies formed in the early universe and gathered themselves together into huge clusters. Ordinary matter would be attracted into regions of concentrated dark matter and the universe as we know it today could develop." Particle physicists have proposed a long list of exotic particles left over from the Big Bang, as possible candidates to make up the dark matter. They include heavy neutrinos, Higgsinos, gravitinos, axions, photinos and wimps (weakly interacting massive particles). The Cobe observations tell us

nothing directly about the identity of dark matter. But they give a basis for calculating how much dark matter there is in the universe. That is the vital issue for the future of the universe.

Is there enough matter for gravity to stop the universe expanding and to draw everything together again in a Big Crunch tens of billions of years from now? Or will

the universe continue flying apart

for ever, as the stars gradually burn out and everything spreads out into an infinite coldness?

The first reaction of some scientists to the Cobe results was that they supported the idea of a "closed universe" which would pull itself back together. Others continued to support the "open universe" theory. Professor Martin Rees, director of Cambridge University's Institute of Astronomy, said tentatively that they were consistent with a "flat universe" precisely balanced between being open and closed.

What is needed now to solve the riddle of the universe is more precise observations from Cobe. backed up by ground-based instruments which Prof Rees said would soon be able to detect irregularities in the background radiation.

It is reasonable to expect that, by the end of the century, there will be a scientific consensus about the ultimate fate of the universe. That may be of no practical use to anyone, but it is bound to have a cultural and social impact on humanity, knowing whether our ultimate future is in another cosmic fireball or cold nothingness.

EC move on direct mail will create problems

From Mr Peter Chilcott. Sir, Andrew Hill's article on proposed EC data protection legislation ("Data protection raises EC hackles", April 21) covers much essential ground in this debate but misses some vital points. The proposed directive, in part intended to protect consumers from "junk. mail", will have precisely the Grounds for a Lloyds bid for Midland are 'dubious', says union

From Mr Leif Mills. Sir. There has been much recent press speculation about the possibility of Lloyds Bank making a bid to take over Midland Bank. The speculation is allegedly based on sources from within Lloyds Bank. Your own editorial (April 22) seemed to support the idea on the very dubious grounds that "only a full-scale integration of two banks is likely to bring about the scale of cost-cuts the indus-

If Lloyds were to merge with Midland there would be wholesale branch closures and reductions of staff and - contrary to what your editorial said - this is not what the industry needs, nor is it what the staff needs. There is a great myth being perpetrated that Britain is "over-hanked". Such myths carry credence when they are repeated, but there is no evidence for that. In comparison with many other developed countries we are under-banked: there are more people still paid in cash and there are more monetary transactions carried out in cash than elsewhere. Staff numbers in the various British banks have been cut fairly savagely in the last year and the result is that existing staff markins and pressures have become extremely acute. At the same time the pre-tax profit figures - without allowng for the incidence of had debts because of the economic recession ~ have been extremely good and this is a direct result of the efforts of the staff in branches up and down the country. If Lloyds makes a bid for Midland, then I trust that the director-general of the Office of Fair Trading will immediately call for a reference to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission. I would hope, however, that Llovds does not make such a bld. If it does, it will add to uncertainty and confusion - and this is the last thing that staff as well as customers need. Leif Mills, general secretary.

Shareholders will be asked to approve the payment of a special 10p dividend as a means of "rewarding existing sharehold-ers ahead of the proposed flotation", which will see Hollinger's stake reduced to about 70 per cent. The dividend will be worth £11.1m to Hollinger.

Mr Black said that the prospect of economic recovery made this an appropriate moment to float the Daily Telegraph, which will change its name to The Telegraph, if shareholders approve. The float will be through a public offering in the UK, and possibly limited private placements

Central TV |

By Raymond Snoddy

WITH THE announcement yesterday of a near 28 per cent growth in pre-tax profits at Central Independent Television, Mr Leslie Hill, the chairman, revealed he had written to Mr David Mellor, the new secretary for National Heritage, calling for a two-year extension to the moratorium on ITV takeovers.

Under broadcasting legislation takeovers will become possible at the beginning of 1994. Mr Hill believes the moratorium should be extended until the end of 1995 because only then are the television takeover rules throughout the EC likely to be fair.

Central has been campaign-ing against the fact that EC companies will be able to take over ITV companies, whereas in most other Community countries there are barriers to

"I believe that UK companies should be allowed to grow at home, free from the threat of takeover by EC media giants, at least until broadcasting ownership rules in every country in the Community - instead of, uniquely, in Britain - provide fair competition and fair opportunities for all," Mr Hill wrote to the National Heritage secretary.

The profit for 1991 rose 27.5 per cent and was ahead of market expectations at £24.4m, compared with £19.2m. The shares moved up 40p to £13.75.

Profit before the special exchequer levy was £44.8m (£36.6m), the highest in Central's 10-year history and the best recorded by an ITV company last year.

Turnover was 2.7 per cent lower at £306.6m, with advertising revenue 1.4 per cent down to £229.7m - although the share of ITV revenue was maintained at 14.4 per cent. Operating costs were cut by nearly 29 per cent to £62.8m.

Earnings per share increased to 56.1p. (44.2p). The final dividend is 23p to make a total of 30.5p (28.5p).

Mr Mark Beilby, media analyst at Warburg Securities expects pre-tax profits of £38m from the group this year with £45m in 1993.

Forte to manage Hillsdown plans Balmoral Hotel Canadian growth By Bernard Simon in Toronto

Mr Reed had some encouragement for investors, saying that the group was experiencing a rise in activity which appeared to be slightly stronger than the earlier unsustained - one referred to at the interim stage. "The dan-

PRE-TAX profits at Peugeot Talbot, the UK subsidiary of the French car maker, fell 54 per cent last year to £50m, against £109m in 1990 and a record £135m in the preceding

The company out-performed most rival car makers in the UK, however, as Ford, Rover, Jaguar and Rolls-Royce plunged into heavy losses in the face of the steep recession in the new car market. Mr Geoffrey Whalen, managing director, yesterday forecast a small increase in that market this year to around 1.7m units, from 1.59m in 1991, the lowest level since 1982.

"The car market is still slug-gish but we believe that with the recent reduction in car tax and the uncertainty of the General Election behind us, overall sales will now pick up.

He forecast that Peugeot's UK car sales would increase by about 10 per cent this year to 127,000, and that output at its Rytonassembly plant would rise 3 per cent to 90,700. Mr Whalen warned however, that profits would again be under pressure. in 1992. "It will be difficult to improve on the 1991 position."

Production at Ryton fell by 24.5 per cent to 87,965 (116,505). The company was aiming to increase productivity at the plant by 10 per cent this year following a 13 per cent improvement in 1991. funding for Canary Wharf his stake

By Robert Peston

OLYMPIA & York's bankers are likely to provide £15m ($26.55m) to allow work at the Canary Wharf development in east London to continue to the end of May only.

O&Y had been hoping to receive a £110m facility from a group of 11 banks, which have provided loans of about £1bn for the Canary Wharf project. This £110m would have been enough to finance Canary Wharf's costs for 90 days, dur-ing which O&Y hoped to conclude negotiations on a reorganisation of its worldwide debt of C$14.3bn (US$12bn).

However, the 11 banks including Citicorp and Manufacturers Hanover of the US, Credit Suisse of Switzerland, Royal Bank of Canada, Canadian Imperial Bank of Canada, Barclays and Lloyds of the UK

 do not believe they have been given good enough information on the financial health of Olympia & York Developments. O&Y's parent company. So they are only prepared to provide £15m, which they hope will be sufficient to meet Canary Wharf's needs to the end of May. However, the bankers who negotiated the deal have to receive the permission of their senior directors before the money can be disbursed. Therefore. O&Y is unlikely to be told that it has been given the facility till after the weekend. In case O&Y runs out of cash before the £15m facility is formally approved, bankers are providing a much smaller emergency line of credit. O&Y tried to raise C$100m

(US$84.7m) to finance its operations in Canada, where it has its headquarters. But a group of Canadian banks, including Royal Bank of Canada and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, refused to provide the full amount. They are allowing O&Y to draw on about C$20m.

Meanwhile, Mr Steve Miller, the investment banker who is in charge of O&Y negotiations with its banks, has returned to New York for a weekend meeting to formulate the details of O&Y's reorganisation plan.

Mr Miller has been concentrating on persuading banks to provide sufficient new facilities to allow the company to continue working.

Now O&Y, led by the founder Mr Paul Reichmann, has to provide banks with detailed proposals relating to how much of its interest payments it needs to defer and how long it wants to cease payments of principal.

Valmet acquires machine group

By Sara Webb in Stockholm

VALMET, the Finnish state-controlled paper machinery and engineering group, is to acquire 91 per cent of Tampella Papertech of Finland, one of the world's leading producers of board machinery.

Valmet plans to set up an operating group with annual sales of FMI.6bn ($352m). This would combine its existing board, tissue and specialty paper machine manufacturing companies and Tampella Papertech's board machine production plants.

Kellogg helped by sale of unit

By Nikki Tait

KELLOGG, the US cereals group, reported after-tax profits of $196.2m in the first three months of 1992, up from $163.1m in the same period a year earlier. Kellogg said the results included a one-off pre-tax gain of $58.5m from the sale of Fearn International, a US food service subsidiary, partially offset by a charge of $22.4m following the sale of its conveience foods operations in Canada, and some other US assets. Without these distorting factors, first-quarter profits would have improved by 4.5 per cent. Sales were up by 6.6 per cent in the first three months, to $1.51bn. Kellogg shares rose $% to $57% in early trading.

Aetna Life & Casualty improves to $207m

By Nikki Tait in New York

AETNA Life & Casualty, the largest shareholder-owned insurer in the US, improved its profits performance in the first quarter of 1992 following reduced losses from its property-related holdings and asset sale proceeds.

The company reported a $207m profit after tax in the first three months, compared with $137m a year earlier. The improvement derived from a turnround on net realised capital gains - with Aetna chalking up a $76m profit after tax this time, compared with a $16m loss a year ago. The company said without this its results would have been lower.

SUGAR - London FOX

Like most of the large US composites, Aetna has been faced by souring real estate investments recently, but yesterday it said that realised capital losses from additions to reserves for mortgage and property write-downs were $41m, against $52m a year ago.

Realised gains of $117m more than offset this - with $50m coming from the sale of a portion of the company's interest in MBIA, the bond insurer. On the commercial propertycasualty side, Aetna's first quarter earnings were $60m, compared with $33m a year ago, but this included net realised capital gains of $37m against $1m in the first three months of 1991.

former interests This follows the announcement yesterday that Mr Pense had settled his differences with Nordbanken, the Swedish bank which currently controls Nobel Industries.

Mr Penser was forced to hand over his 70 per cent stake in Nobel Industries to state-controlled Nordbanken after the collapse of Gamlestaden, a finance company controlled by Nobel.

Gamlestaden suffered large credit losses in the property sector.

From the outset Mr Penser maintained that Nordbanken was wrong to seize his shares in Nobel Industries, a company which he had built up over several years, as collat-eral and that he was prepared to repay his debts to the Swedish banks.

According to the agreement reached yesterday between Nordbanken and Mr Penser, the Swedish financier has regained ownership of Yggdrasil, his former holding company for a token SKr1. Yggdrasil owns shares in a handful of small developing companies.

Nordbanken also said it would welcome a bid from Mr Penser for the 70 per cent stake in Nobel Industries, which currently has a stock market capitalisation of about SKr7bn.

Mr Penser said he would "let the dust settle a bit" before announcing his immediate plans, but indicated that be was keen to buy back his Nobel Industries shares, which were valued at SKr5bn. He added that several international institutions had indicated that they would help him to finance the acquisition. As part of the deal, Mr Penser has withdrawn his SKr3.8bn legal action against Nordban-

Posing for the cameras yesterday with a formal handshake, Mr Penser and Mr Biorn Wahlstrom, the chairman of Nordbanken, claimed that they had patched up their differences over the affair. Nordbanken has been strongly criticised for its conduct towards Nobel Industries. However, Mr Wahlstrom vesterday denied that Nordbanken's conduct was improper, saying that both parties had been keen to find a solution to the problem.

GENERAL MOTORS, the US vehicle manufacturer which has been suffering heavy losses, is to strengthen its balance sheet and bolster liquidity through a worldwide offering of common stock that could raise up to $2,3bn.

The offering was announced yesterday morning shortly before the company unveiled further management changes in its troubled North American operations. The share issue will be an important test of investors' views of the company following a coup by non-executive directors earlier this month. This involved a boardroom shake-up designed to intensify GM's efforts to restore the North American operations to The share issue will be GM's

Court clears way for Acil bid Hungarian

By Kevin Brown in Sydney

AUSTRALIA'S Federal Court yesterday cleared the way for an A$127m (US$97.6m) bid for Australian Consolidated Investments (Acil) by two companies associated with Sir Ron Brierley, the New Zealand entrepreneur. The court validated an offer document issued by Rossington Holdings, the vehicle for the joint bid by Brierley Investments (BIL) of New Zealand and GPG, the British company acquired by Sir Ron in 1989.

The court extended until May 1 the deadline for Acil to send its response to shareholders. The previous deadline expired on Tuesday.

Rossington lifted its stake in Acil to just under 20 per cent earlier this week by buying 3.8m shares in the market at 20 cents each. However, the company denied it was the buyer of a further 8m Acil shares which changed hands yesterday.

Sir Ron launched the joint bid in February, but has faced strong opposition from Acil which has fought the offer in the courts and advised shareholders to reject it.

In the Federal Court, Acil argued that Rossington's offer document did not adequately state how the bid would be funded. Rossington told the court that BIL would provide 90 per cent of the funding and GPG 10 per cent.

The ultimate success or failure of the Rossington bid will depend on a group of banks which controls a 19.9 per cent stake held by the Adelaide Steamship group and a 40 per cent stake formerly controlled by Mr Alan Bond;

Rossington's bid for Acil is the first joint takeover attempt by the two companies with which Sir Ron is associated since he acquired GPG. He resigned as Brierley Investments chairman in 1990, but remains a director.

Acil, formerly Bell Resources, was a vehicle for takeover activity by the late Mr Robert Holmes à Court, It was later part of the Bond Corporation Holdings group.

insurance group which has run into controversy over its investment in Aachener & Münchener Beteiligungs (AMB) of Germany, reported profits of FFr2.69bn ($477m) for 1991, little changed from the FF12.7bn of 1990.

AGF is the latest in a line of French insurance groups to announce lacklustre results for 1991. Axa, the largest private sector insurer, disclosed a 28 ASSURANCES Générales de France (AGF), the French des Assurances de Paris (UAP) which is, like AGF, a state-controlled concern, reported an 11 per cent fall to FFr3.77bn on Thursday.

The French insurers have been hit by intense competition within their own domestic market and by the poor performance of some of their international operations, particularly in the UK and Italy, where AGF is present.

AGF saw revenue rise by 20 per cent from FFr46hn to FFr55.3bn in 1991. The rate of sales growth was slightly lower, at 9.7 per cent, on a comparable basis.

It made nearly 40 per cent of its sales outside France where last year. Sanofi also has an it reported a good performance from its businesses in Soain. Switzerland and Germany.

drug company rises 190%

By Nicholas Denton in Budapest

CHINOIN, the Hungarian pharmaceuticals company in which Sanofi of France has a substantial minority shareholding, increased after-tax profits by 190 per cent for 1991. Chinoin's net profits rose to Ft2.29bn ($29m) on sales of Ft14bn. The performance owes much to the success of Jumex. the drug against Parkinson's disease which was the first Hungarian compound to be approved for use in the US, and Ipriflavon, a treatment for osteoporosis. Royalties from the two helped Chinoin increase sales in western countries by 44 per cent and compensated for the collapse of the Soviet market.

Chinoin's earnings trend indicates that the profit-related purchase price for the 40 per cent stake acquired by Sanofi will move towards the top end of the $75m-$150m range agreed with the Hungarian authorities option to take its shareholding to a majority from 1994.

Chinoin's figures contrast markedly with those of other western joint ventures in Hungary which have generally suf-fered disappointing sales and profits.

FOREIGN EXCHANGES

D-Mark continues to gain

The D-mark once again commanded attention on foreign exchange markets yesterday, where Thursday's money supply figures from Germany continued to hold sway over traders. The German MS statistics, which revealed that money supply had risen by 9.7 per cent in March, have con-vinced traders that no interest rate cut is likely in Germany in the near future.

According to Mr Neil MacKinnon, Chief economist at Yamaichi, market sentiment was dominated by those fig-ures all through yesterday. "It is likely that the Bundesbank will resist pressure for an interest rate cut at this weekend's G7 meeting," he said "And many are worried that they will actually increase ended up against both the dollar and sterling. In London, it closed at DM1.6505 against the dollar, a cent up compared to its previous close of DM1.6605.

Against sterling, the D-Mark ended at DM2.9250 after a pre-vious close of DM2.9300 D-Mark strength apart, the dollar had its own reasons for a weak performance on markets yesterday. Some traders said that dollar support had been partly undermined by a growing frustration with the pace of US recovery, with many traders hedging their bets until an important series of US economic indicators are published next week. In London, the pound ended at close of $1.7650. In Yen-dollar trading, dealers seemed unwilling to take any bets on the possible outcome of this weekend's G7 summit in Washington. In London, the dollar ended almost unchanged against the Yen at Y134.55. "The market is taking the G7 with a pinch of salt," said Mr MacKinnon of Yamaichi. He recalled that prior to the Gar-den City G7 summit in Januand dealers did not want to be caught out a second time.

In early New York trading, the dollar ended up slightly from a lower opening. It was at DM1.617 up from 1.6485 at the opening. Sterling's weakness against the D-Mark came despite some encouraging indicators on the UK economy. Sluggish High Street sales before the UK election were disappointing, though Britain's current account deficit at £575m in March, was in line with expec-tations. The market chose to ignore these figures altogether. feeling that German economic issues were all-important. Ster-ling could not withstand a surge in the Franc, which resumed its place third from bottom in the EMS grid after France announced a FFr 1.4bn trade surplus for March, far higher than forecast. Sterling ended at Ffr 9.8825 compared to a previous close of Ffr 9.8925.

MONEY MARKETS UK rates firmer (11.00 a.m. Apr.24) 3 months US deltars bid 311 offer 44 The fising rates are the arithmetic means rounded to the nearest one-decisions, of the bid and offered rates for SSRs quoted to the market by five reference hanks at 11.00 a.m. each working day. The banks are Relations/Westmann, Bank, Bank of Tollyo, Decision Bank, Bank of Tollyo, Decision Bank, Bank of Parts and Morsan Causartos Tred.

There was little change in rates on the money markets yesterday, where most traders still held firmly to the belief that an interest rate cut is a far-off prospect. Thursday's increased money supply figures in Germany again hung over the markets, with one analyst suggesting that an economic turn-around in Germany is now unlikely to come before the end of the third quarter. In the interbank market, 3-month money, a key indica-future base rate movements. remained unchanged on the previous night's close at 10% it. However, one trader said that it had ended high on the week, considering that it had been trading at around 10%-% in recent days.

One year money ended a touch firmer on the previous day's close. It finished at

And the second

England started the day by posting a shortage of around £1.15bn. In early operations, £1.15bn. In early operations, the Bank purchased bills totalling £153m. These were made up of £5m of sterling Band-1 bank bills at 10% per cent, £5m of Band-2 bank bills at 10% per cent, £34m of Band-3 bills at 10 ½ per cent, £2m of Band-4 Late Assistance bills at 10½ per cent and £107m of Band-4 bank bills and £107m of Band-4 bank bills at 10% per cent.

In further operations the bank purchased £95m of Band-3 bills at 10m per cent and £48m of Band-4 bank bills at 10 per cent.

In the afternoon, the Bank revised its estimate of the shortage to around £1.1bn. The Bank purchased a further £468m of bank bills at 10%%. taking £348m in band one and £120m in Band-2. It then provided late assistance of £310m.

German call money held steady at about 9.65% despite the sharp jump in German M3 money supply in March. On Thursday, the Bundesbank said that March M3 had risen by a much higher than Thursday night at 10½½. In the futures market, the June sterling contract again ended at 89.63, indicating an implied interest rate of 10.37%.

In the discount market, it was, in the words of one trader, "another expensive day" by a much higher than expected 9.7 per cent annualised rate after an 8.6 per cent rise in Rebruary. However, dealers said that the surprise increase did not change the likelihhod that call money would stay up near the 9.75 per cent Lombard rate for trader, "another expensive day 9.75 per cent Lombard rate for money." The Bank of the foreseeable future.

A THREE-WEEK trading account that might easily have been expected to end with a whimper closed with a burst of support for London equities yesterday.

After initial weakness, the FT-SE 100 Index surged ahead in afternoon trading to end the day 33.2 points up, the high of the day, at 2,643. This left the index 265 points better, since the account opened on April 6. - a gain of more than 11 per

Lasmo strong on bid talk

OIL EXPLORATION group Lasmo was the strongest performer in the FT-SE 100 index yesterday, the shares surging 26 to 233p - a rise of more than 12.5 per cent. Rumours ofa possible bid by Total of France and also disposals. prompted particularly heavy turnover of 7.3m in the underlying market. It also saw busy trading in options with 2,887 contracts traded - equivalent to just under 3m shares.

Analysts tended to be sceptical about a full scale bid, but suggested that Total might be interested in Lasmo's Californian refining operation, inherited when it took over Ultra-mar last vear. Lasmo has around £1bn in debts and is known to be keen to reduce its gearing. Mr Keith Morris at Carr Kitcat & Aitken said that between £200m and £300m may be raised by disposing of the Californian refining division and that this would be regarded as a key to getting Lasmo's gearing back down.

WEEK IN THE MARKETS

Sugar prices reach 16-month highs

RAW SUGAR prices on the world market this week broke out of the strait-jacket that had confined them for the past 16 months as fears of a squeeze on nearby supplies prompted heavy short-covering by trad-ers in New York. Computer fund buying was also reported as the prompt May position in New York moved above the psychologically-significant 10 cents-a-lb mark for the first time since late 1990.

Thursday saw the prompt May position at the Big Apple's Coffee, Sugar and Cocoa Exchange reach 10.28 cents a lb, up from at 9.59 cents at the end of last week. A more cautions mood prevailed yesterday and in late trading the May price had reacted to 10.05 cents a lb, but traders said the funds and other speculators were still holding big long positions because of concern about supplies of raws from Thailand and drought-bit South Africa.

That concern was clearly reflected in the premium of 36 cents for the May position, which is to expire soon, over the July position. When May sugar became the prompt position at the end of March it was trading at a discount to July of recent price upsurge. GNI Research noted that Thursday's sharp rise at the London Futures and Options Exchange had "inevitably" been magnified by short-covering and described the market's strength as "an ephemeral affair". In yesterday's daily market report GNI said that the South Africans had sed that they had taken steps to ensure that export obligations would be satisfied. There is mounting speculation that a large proportion of the open position will be taken out against actuals [physical deliveries] on their [the South Africans'] behalf," the report said. "This still leaves the specs and funds long in the run up to next Thursday's expiry [of the May position].

Since they are unlikely to want to take delivery a heavy bout of long liquidation is on the GNI said it was also worth noting that the Japanese, who are big buyers of South African sugar, had not reported any significant tightening of conditions on the Tokyo market. In its World Commodity Forecasts, published this week, the Economist Intelligence Unit paints a fairly sober pic-There were doubts in the ture of the longer term sugar world sugar market, however, price outlook. It estimates that about the sustainability of the it will average 8.5 cents a lb

during the present quarter and in the second half of this year, compared with 8.13 cents in the first quarter. For next year it sees a further modest rise with the price average reaching 3.75 cents in first quarter and remaining at that level in the second and third quarters. But that would still be below the 1991 average of 8.97 cents a Ib and the previous year's 12.55

cents. The EIU report describes a similar prospect for robusta coffee prices. It forecasts the present quarter's average at 45 cents a lb, up from 44.8 cents in the January-March period, ris-ing gradually to 48 cents in the final quarter and 50 cents in July-September 1993.

This week saw the July position on the London robusta futures market dip to a fresh 17-year low of $782 a tonne equivalent to 35.4 cents a lb as stale long-liquidation in a thin market touched off stoploss selling orders. The price rallied to $802 a tonne yesterday morning but came under renewed pressure and closed at $787 a tonne, down $14 on the

Cocoa prices slipped to 9-month lows meanwhile, with the July position ending at 2808 a tonne, down £11 on the

A proposal at UN talks in Geneva by the Ivory Coast, the biggest cocoa producer, for a new international price-stabilisation agreement based on export quotas made little impact. GNI described the plan as "merely a political face-sav ing manoeuvre as the consuming members have already said that they will only consider a [stock] withholding scheme". Traders thought support might emerge around £600 a tonne mark, but otherwise they saw little to prevent a continued decline in cocoa prices, especially as manufacturer buying interest was con-spicuous by its absence. In a pretty routine week at the London Metal Exchange interest remained dominated by the squeeze on zinc supplies for nearby delivery. This helped to lift the cash price by $33.50 to $1,339.50 a tonne and widened its premium over the three months price by $16.50 to $44 at one point. By yesterday's close, however, the premium had narrowed to $35 a tonne. Richard Mooney

Higher bond yields send Dow lower

Wall Street

ALTHOUGH a recovery in drug stocks helped to offset the negative impact on sentiment of another rise in bond yields, share prices suffered slight losses as the underlying tone remained weak, writes Patrick Harverson in New York

By 1 pm the Dow Jones Industrial Average was down 6.71 at 3,341.90, having spent the morning session within a few points of Thursday's close. The more broadly based Standard & Poor's 500 was also slightly lower at midsession, down 1.00 at 410.60, while the Nasdaq composite index slipped 3.00 to 573.05. Turnover on the NYSE was 109m shares by 1 pm, and declines marginally outpaced rises by 783 to

The rise in long-term bond $1% at $53%, Pfizer put on $1% sions would decline for the rest yields continued to unsettle equity markets. Higher Treasury yields are seen as a threat to economic recovery because they put upward pressure on mortgage rates, and also make stocks less attractive to yieldhungry investors.

The feeling that the market is overvalued, at least until corporate earnings catch up with the recent gains in equity prices, is another negative factor. The generally positive first quarter results had been discounted by the market, and more good economic news was needed before investors made fresh purchases, analysts said. Drug stocks, which had been sold heavily on Thursday on concern that they would underperform the market, bounced back. Merck rose $1% to at $67% and Eli Lilly rose $1 to

General Motors dropped $2% to $40% in turnover of 1.6m shares as the market awaited news of the latest developments in the planned reorganisation of the car maker's unprofitable North American business. GM also notified the Securities and Exchange Commission that it will raise more than $2bn from a public offer-ing of 50m shares. GM's weakness spread to other car stocks, with Ford down $1/4 at $43% and Chrysler off $\% at $18\%. Among firmer or steady bank stocks, Chemical rose $% to $37% in brisk trading after the company's management said that cost savings from its recent merger with Manufacturers Hanover would exceed targets, that loan loss proviof the year and that revenues are currently exceeding internal estimates. Also higher were JP Morgan, up $% at $55%, Bankers Trust, $1/2 firmer at $59, and BancOne, up $% at $10%.

Chiquita Brands plunged $5% to $19%, or more than 20 per cent, after the company reported late on Thursday that first quarter profit was well down on a year ago, and warned that it did not expect to meet 1992 earnings fore-

TORONTO stocks were lower at midsession. At 1 pm, the TSE 300 composite index stood at 3,366.1, down 5.4, in volume of 11.9m shares valued at C$133.5m. Declines led

The gold index fell 63.17 or 1.4 per cent to 4,359.72 as Comex June gold futures slipped.

Among active stocks, Scotiabank rose C$\% to C$19\% while Alcan fell C$\% to C$24\%.

Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce

An editing error in yesterday's article on the Toronto stock market made it appear that Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce could not easily absorb a big write-down on its Olympia and York loans. In fact, the bank's chairman said on April 15 that the property developer's troubles will have only a limited impact on the bank's earnings. We apologise for the error.

its worst slump in share prices and turnover since the 1960s, international investors might get some comfort from the fact that Japanese equity valua-tions are finally coming into line with their overseas counterparts.

In the past, investors in Japanese equities were forced to disregard financial ratios due to the gross share price infla-tion in Japan. But now that the asset inflation factor of the late 1980s has been eliminated by the squeeze on liquidity, international valuations have

The Nikkei average has fallen 56 per cent from its peak in the late 1980s, and its price/ earnings (p/e) ratio has fallen from 75 to 38. With Japanese shares at their cheapest since the early 1980s, investors have a chance to pick up blue chips at bargain-basement prices.

Mr Jason James, strategist at James Capel in Tokvo, says that blue chip manufacturers are now on a multiple of 35 down from a peak of 66, and compared with 22 a decade ago. The consolidated pie ratio for Sharp has fallen to 28 from an all-time high of 35, while the multiple for Matsushita Electric Industrial has declined from 20 to 16.

Current levels indicate that Tokyo share prices have returned to a more normal relationship with overseas stock markets. The p/e ratio for the Nikkei average now stands at 38 compared to 23 in April 1982, while that of the Standard & Poor's 500 has risen from 8 to 25. However, Japanese p/e ratios remain distorted by several factors, such as the low liquidity created by Japan's stable shareholding structure - some 40 per cent of stocks are believed to be held by long-term investors.

Strategic equity stakes are held by companies belonging to the same group - "keiretsu", or business partners. Main relationship banks are also stable shareholders, as are sion fund of the company in which they have a stake. Individuals own only 20 per cent of all listed companies, while corporations, including financial institutions, own more than 70 per cent.

the stock market's p/e, which is calculated by dividing the total capitalisation by the total net earnings. Since most listed companies own shares in other listed companies, it would not take the total capitalisation to buy the whole market. For example, when buying shares in Matsushita Electric Industrial, one would also be buying into its listed affiliates.

The total capitalisation of the Tokyo stock market is estimated at Y275,000bn ($2,043bn). However, this figure is inflated by 40 per cent, since only 60 per cent of the market is free

Accounting differences are also cited as a reason for high ple ratios in Japan. Japanese companies tend to understate earnings due to their accelerated depreciation policy. Furthermore, Japanese companies are only required to report con-solidated figures if subsidiaries contribute more than 10 per cent of group assets, sales and net income. As profits can be manipulated by shifting income between subsidiaries. and to special reserves, earnings figures are not always

Some of the accounting dif ferences can be narrowed by using consolidated income instead of parent earnings. This will increase earnings, the denominator for the market pi e, by some 20 per cent. With some of the "distortion" factors stripped out, the p/e for the Tokyo market works out at just under 20. The figure remains open to debate since cross-shareholdings can improve business relationships, and profitability. In some cases, quantifying accounting distortions is virtually impossible, since earnings manipulation does not appear in company statements.

book (p/b) ratio - the share price relative to net asset value say that Japanese companies look attractive by this measure. The number of shares whose p/b ratios are less than 1 has increased as a result of the stock market's

The consolidated p/b ratio for Matsushita is now 0.8, and 0.91 for Hitachi. Some analysts argue that since Japanese companies do not revalue their assets, the p/b ratio only reflects the share price move-

Other commonly used valuation methods are market capitalisation to sales, and price to cash flow. Using such measures, Japanese industrial blue chips appear to be fairly valued compared with overseas counterparts. According to James Capel, the market cap/sales ratio for Honda is 0.3, compared with 0.2 for Ford Motor and 0.3 for BMW. The price/ cash flow ratio for Toshiba is 5 while General Electric is 11.9 and GEC is 8.

However, with investor confidence severely battered, and evidence of a slowing economy adding to the gloom, valuations may look even cheaper in a few months' time. If the economy takes longer than expected to recover, even blue chip manufacturing companies face the risk of a further downward revision in sales, profits and cashflow.

* Frankfurt steady as strike threat looms

SENIOR bourses regained their composure after the German money supply scare on Thursday, writes Our Markets Staff.

FRANKFURT fell slightly but confounded dealers who had expected a steep decline. The DAX index closed down 6.74 at 1.745.70 for a 0.2 per cent fall on the week. The FAZ index, calculated at midsession, shed 3.76 to 710.81, barely changed on the week. Turnover fell to DM5bn from DM6.1bn.

News that postal workers had voted to strike had no immediate impact, but investors remained cautious shead of the weekend when more ballot results are expected.

Continental closed up DM3.50 or 1.3 per cent at DM281, off a new year's intraday high of DM283.50. The tyre company was reported to have held a presentation in London yesterday. Some analysts attributed Continental's rise this ek to expectations of good 1992 forecasts at its press conference next month and to confirmation that European tyreprices are to increase.

Engineering workers add weight to public sector threat

German union calls for 'massive warning strikes'

By Christopher Parkes In Bonn

WESTERN GERMANY'S 4m engineering workers yesterday rejected a 3.3 per cent pay offer and prepared to add their weight to the wave of strikes already threatening chaos in public ser-vices next week.

Mr Franz Steinkühler, president of the IG Metall union, said the offer was meant as a provocation and would be treated as such. He called for "massive warning strikes" next week. Three factories in Hesse were hit immediately as 4,000 workers walked out in the morning. The danger of widespread public sector stoppages was height-ened when the DAG white-collar union announced 74.7 per cent of its membership had chosen action. A 70 per cent "yes" vote is needed for strikes to be called. Ballot results from the main public service union OeTV, with 1.2m members, are expected today.

Work at the Hamburg central post office, which handles 4m pieces of mail a day, was disrupted vesterday when 400 staff were called out on indefinite strike. Services were already "crippled", the DPG post office workers union claimed. Colognebased motorway maintenance workers also stopped work.

Results from smaller groups underlined the strength of feeling in the workforce. The DPG union reported a 95.4 per cent strike vote. Almost 90 per cent of motorwav maintenance workers in the VDS union voted for action.

Mr Josef Hilgers, the VDS leader, said that even a 5.4 per cent pay deal, proposed recently by an arbitration council and rejected by employers, would leave his members only DM80 (£27) a month better off.

The employers, led by Mr Rudolf Seiters, interior minister, confirmed on Thursday that, while they were prepared to reopen negotiations, they would not per cent this year. They claim that excessive labour costs forced them to cut 62,000 manufacturing jobs last year. IG Metall is demanding 9.5 per cent. Mr Helmut Schlesinger, president of the Bundesbank, warned of a "great danger of a further turn in the spiral" of wages and people expect wage rises to offset price rises which have resulted from higher taxes and government levies"

There was no sign that the public sector unions, representing about 3m workers, were prepared to take up Mr Seiters' offer of more talks. Their previous strike, which lasted three days in 1974, was limited mainly to local transport and rubbish collection services in key towns.

Channel tunnel project faces further increases in costs-

and Robert Peston

EUROTUNNEL, the embattled Channel tunnel group, yesterday announced a further big rise in the cost of the project and confirmed it was in technical breach of loan covenants.

This will prevent it drawing cash without special permission from its bankers.

The group has also started proceedings which it says would allow it to set aside a ruling that it must triple contractors' monthly progress payments to of Eurotunnel's annual results in London that the estimated cost of completing the project - due to open next year - had risen since last autumn from £7.37bn to £8.1bn. The final cost would be even higher because the project was not expected to break even until 1996.

The uncertainty over the project's costs will lead to added complications in Eurotunnel's attempt to persuade banks to allow it to continue to draw down funds following the breach in loan covenants. The breach was caused by an increase in the forecast of cash outflow during the first years of the tunnel's operation because of delays in providing a full train service, higher costs and economic growth at a lower level than expected.

Eurotunnel has equity and banking facilities of £8.9hn which it says is enough for it to com-plete construction. Nevertheless borrowings will continue to rise indebtedness taking it close to

The agreement came at the end of a week of uncertainty surrounding intensive meetings in Peshawar, close to Pakistan's border with Afghanistan.

It also came ahead of tomorrow's deadline set by Mr Gul-buddin Hekmatyar, leader of the Hezb-i-Islami, who had threat-ened to order his men to storm the Afghan capital if the government there did not surrender.

Mujahideen supporters said that, with Mr Hekmatyar's group participating in the council, his threat no longer existed. At yesterday's meeting a representative of Mr Hekmatyar accepted the agreement. However, it was pointed out that Mr Hekmatyar

Several thousand guerrillas from rival mujahideen groups slipped into Kabul yesterday in what seemed to be a move towards taking control of the city. The Afghan government has said it is prepared to hand over power to a united mujahideen government.

The deal came shortly after the arrival in Pakistan of Mr Boutros Boutros Ghali, UN secretary general, who said the UN would maintain its role of conciliation to bring peace in Afghanistan. delicately poised as ever. The financial position appears rather worse. Granted, Eurotunnei has effectively disabled last month's damaging ruling from the disputes panel by seeking time-consuming arbitration on the small matter of the original contract. That levels the score with the contractors, so for practical purposes the project's commercial and operational future will once again be thrashed out behind closed doors. To Sir Alastair Morton that must look reassuringly like business as usual. But the future shape of its finances has arguably never been less clear than now.

It must be a matter of partial relief for the banks that accusations of mutual villainy which flew freely around two years ago are absent this time. That said, the stakes are higher, if only because Eurotunnel's ability to absorb funding problems gets smaller the nearer it gets to opening for business. Its margin for error is already a mere £870m. Hence, perhaps, the 5 per cent fall in the company's shares yes-

Until the tunnel is producing revenues, the banks will have to grant a series of waivers to their funding agreements just to allow the company to draw on its existing facilities. Any further disputes or delays - and Eurotunnel hints there are plenty waiting to happen - will push back the point at which the project breaks even. So at this stage, any increase in the banks' lending looks decidedly unlikely. While the risk of outright foreclosure is negligible, the danger is that the banks will demand a higher price for their co-operation. For all his ingenuity, even Sir Alastair will have his work cut out to protect shareholders' interests to the finish. An eventual rights issue seems inevitable either

Markets

The past week in the London market has confirmed the feeling of solidity about the post-election rally. It is not just that the FT-SE ended the week almost exactly where it started, after a run of heavy trading sessions. There is a growing sense that the economic recovery, however feeble, is definitely established. The switch from defensive stocks to cyclicals continues accordingly. A year ago, the p/e on the consumer goods sector was 31/2 points higher than on capital goods. In the run up to the election the graph crossed, for the first time since 1985. The gap has since widened, so that the capital goods p/e is now higher by a full point. Granted, this is as much a matter of shrinking earnings as of rising share prices. But from the viewpoint of investor psychology, the effect emains the same.

The spirit of optimism is the more striking in that investors have plainly accepted that UK interest rates are not about to be cut after all. Indeed, it has become all too clear that it is in the government's interest to keep a tight hold on monetary policy on political grounds. The last thing that is wanted now is a boom that may turn to another slump in five years' time. As the jargon has it, the economic and electoral cycles have to be brought back into line. And with inflationary pressure still detectable in the domes tic economy - to say nothing of Germany - the government is quite able to defend its conduct on the grounds of sound money. An anaemic recovery. in short, is not only likely; it may be a matter of policy as well.

Barclays

Sir John Quinton must take some comfort from the fact that he is not the only top banker in recent times to find that his tenure has been shorter than expected. The list, which includes the likes of Mr Tom Frost at National Westminster and Sir Kit McMahon at Midland, is a long one. Most of those on it would probably claim that they are direct or indirect victims of the recession. But it is in the nature of recessions to expose the real quality of management in banking. That is certainly true of Barclays, with its ill-judged dash for growth when Sir John took the chair.

If you dream about Oysters, we recommend seeing a specialist

What is nonetheless perplexing is that the planned reshuffle involves the promotion of the present managing director, Mr Andrew Buxton, first to chief executive and then to chairman. There is room for doubt over whether the top position should go to a scion of a founding family. And his present position means he must take a share of the blame for the lax cost control which has been a substantial part of

Barclays' problem. There is no obvious reason why Mr Buxton's elevation should of itself reverse a trend which has seen Bar-clays' shares underperform the sector by nearly 30 per cent over the past year. Barciays needs first a clear separation of the roles of chairman and chief executive. Then, if the nonexecutive directors want to make Mr Buxton chairman, they need to find a banker with both practical ability and strategic vision to work alongside him. With no outstanding internal candidate, it may be necessary to look out-

One answer might be for Lloyds whose management has retained its reputation throughout the recession, to take over Midland and for Mr Brian Pearse to return to Barclays. Simple still. Lloyds could merge with Bar clays, a partnership which was mooted in 1968, only to be thwarted by the competition authorities.

Yesterday's Opec meeting in Vienna was always unlikely to produce a significant shift by the cartel. Long before it happened, the meeting had served its purpose of reassuring the market that Opec wanted to defend an oil price floor. After February's chaotic meeting in Geneva, prices first stabilised and then rose moderately, so that Brent crude has recently been hovering below $19 per barrel.

While many of the smaller produc ers would doubtless prefer still higher prices, the Saudis remain reluctant to cut their production. This is partly because there have been tentative signs that demand is beginning to recover, partly because Russian out put is still tumbling. Firmer evidence of economic recovery is unlikely to have arrived before next month's meeting to set third quarter production targets. All the same, the fundamentals look slightly more promising a "consolation prize" for having lost his seat, Mr Patten admitted that had he remained an MP he would probably not have been offered the post.

Mr Henry Keswick, chairman of Jardine Matheson, the Hong Kong conglomerate, said the appointment was "very good news indeed". Mr Keswick, who was believed to have lobbled Downing Street for Lord (formerly Sir David) Wilson to be replaced, said: "Hong Kong needs a politically skilled leader of the highest rank and is very fortunate to have Chris Patten."

Mr Martin Lee, leader of the United Democrats, which has emerged as the main opposition party in Hong Kong's nascent democracy, voiced cautious optimism. He said a politician was better for Hong Kong than a diplomat, and "if he is a good politician, I am sure he will pick things up very quickly".

Mr Cheng Kai-Nam, a pro-China politician, said Mr Patten's appointment showed the British government was attaching impor-tance to Hong Kong shead of the transfer to China. But he expressed disappointment that Mr Patten had little knowledge of Hong Kong and Chinese affairs.

This week the DMF's half-yearly economic outlook singled out the developing countries in general, and the Latin Americans in particular, for praise: they had accepted IMF policies and followed them far more lovally than the richer members of the Fund. It is not just a question of there being no systems argument" any more, as Sir Ralf Dahrendorf, former head of the London School of Economics, puts it. There is just one class of people in charge. In India last October, I found the men in charge enthusiastically ditching the postcolonial orthodoxies of autarky, independence and self-reliance and speaking the same language as the neo-liberals of Washington and London. At the Chilean embassy in Washington last April the finance minister, Alejandro Foxley, enteron the policies of the industrialised world. But it was not about exploitation, or the need for more aid. It was about the need for free trade and the hypocrisy of the rich nations in demanding open markets in the Third World while closing their own.

The vehicle by which the free-market gospel has been transmitted has received scant attention in the rich countries but is omnipresent in the media of the poor the Structural Adjustment Programme. It is like the Middle Ages when missionaries went out from western Europe to the eastern half and taught market gardening and architecture. But the real aim was to spread the word of God. The SAP is the word of God today.

he official line is that it is a natural product of the disinterested advice the IMF and World Bank have offered their clients over four decades. In fact, the SAP emerged from the two organisations when they had to find new ways of using their money. tained journalists with a scathing attack

Both had come to the limits of their ability to resolve mere technical problems - how to supply electricity and highways, how to deal with a short-term balance of payments problem. Successes had been limited, anyway, partly because it was becoming harder to manage bits of economies without managing the lot, So, each developed the means of doing just that.

There was a nasty clash between them in 1988. But that battle has been resolved and they run large parts of the developing world and eastern Europe while insisting the governments concerned are merely implementing their own plans. "We are there to help," as the British used to say.

The essence of the SAP is to encourage governments to follow the right kind of reform policy. A developing country can receive large, cheap loans if it adopts the programmes embodied in the orthodoxy of (more or less) balanced budgets, devaluation, privatisation, and a hearty welcome for foreign investment.

The evolution of structural adjustment programmes has involved the total integration of the IMF and World Bank into the life of the target countries. They have become involved in welfare programmes to minimise the instability that could wreck the new order. A host of social instruments in these countries are organised by the new imperialists. It does not end there.

In recent years, the declarations of G7 summits and IMF-World Bank annual meetings have echoed a further, concern by the rich about the way the poor run their affairs. There is now supposedly, to be strict control on arms exports to developing countries - an inevitable consequence, perhaps, of Saddam Hussein.

The industrialised nations have promoted what is known as a Global Environ-ment Facility in the World Bank. Its purpose is to bribe developing countries into building non-polluting industrial projects: in other words, to prevent others doing what the industrial countries have done.

t was a nice coincidence that the world's trade ministers opened their present, perhaps doomed, global negotiations in Uruguay in 1986. The choice highlighted another return to pre-1914 orthodoxies. Uruguay was the classic prosperous, peripheral economy, the Switzerland of south America, a nation that grew rich on free access to the vast food market of Britain and could erect an exemplary welfare state on the profits.

The re-establishment of such prosperity is a primary aim of the Uruguay Round. It forgets entirely the old "borrow and industrialise" programmes that dominated development thinking for 40 years after 1945. Today, a nation should again be able to grow fat on raising cattle. Developing countries not only accept what would have been regarded as a subordinate role in the world economy two decades ago - they support the demand for a system where that subordination can be exercised.

Finally, of course, there is the now-regular insistence on human rights. It was built into the policy for recognising Croatia and will prove entirely meaningle

There is a portmanteau phrase of the New Imperialism to cover all this - "good governance." It has unsettled Third World establishments but these, apart from one or two or t ide iess savoury isian have no ideological resources to combat

Calling this phenomenon the New Imperialism will be resented. But imperialism was not always a pejorative term. It described the integration - admittedly by force rather than choice - of the world economy. The British 100 years ago saw it as a civilising power. The Americans, too: President McKinley wrote in 1898: "The mission of the United States is one of benevolent assimilation, substituting the mild sway of justice and right for arbitrary rule." That is the policy the US and its allies say they are pursuing today. And it is more or less accepted at face value everywhere outside the last communist redoubts.

Now, this all is amazingly different from, say, 1970 but not very different from 1900. Twenty years ago I was living in Malaysia, writing for the Far Eastern Eco-nomic Review. If I even alluded to "human rights," I was treated as a colonial leftover promoting some cynical western ploy in the Cold War. The phrase "Westminster democracy" was a term of abuse. Today, leaders such as Daniel Arap Moi of Kenya suffer direct foreign interference, and lose aid money, when they articulate their opposition to Westminster democracy.

Within the old imperial lands, things are returning to the status quo ante. The First World War put an end to the horizontal relationships that existed among the upper echelons of society. The English ruling class was more familiar with its German counterpart than with its own countrymen in the slums of London. The retreat into the nation, and the consequent concern with domestic social policy that was caused by the conflicts of the 20th century, has ended. Inequality grows as the wealthier strata absorb ever-higher shares of a nation's income. Huge salaries for managing directors are justified, with a straight face, by reference to the "international market in senior executives.'

n his book The World of Work, published in November, Professor Robert Reich concluded: "When we speak of the 'competitiveness' of Americans in general, we are talking only about how much the world is prepared to spend, on average, for services performed by Americans. Some Americans may command higher rewards; others far lower. No longer are Americans rising or falling together, as if in one large boat. We are, increasingly, in different, smaller boats."

This situation replicates that of the English rentier class before the First World War. The evolution of the domestic business cycle, the happiness or misery of the industrial working class, were matters of abstract concern to those who made their living from Chinese railway bonds or Russian government stock. They could travel Europe with a single currency and seldom

It is a daunting to think that the cataysmic events since 1913 are insienificant historically, but it is obvious that the Russian revolution will not play the role in history that is assigned to the French. The period 1914-1990 has already been called "the short century" and appears even now as an aberration.

Rip van Winkle might well be able to understand our world better than we do because he would be free of the baggage of the past 80 years. There would, however, be one misapprehension. At some moment, he would almost certainly remark: "But aren't you afraid of the socialists?"

The Long View/Barry Riley

Backwards to the future

rists have their think-ing caps on. After all, the UK is now firmly established within the European Monetary System, and many uncertainties have been removed by the decisive neral election result. It is an opportunity to plan ahead So should British investors be making some fundamental adjustments to their strategy? They certainly need to consider the implications should European long-term interest rates remain for some years as high as they are now in real terms. In particular, must the rela-tionship between equity and bond yields change? These questions, more-over, are not confined to the UK.

Equity-oriented British investors believe that even if bonds do well equities will do even better, so why bother with bonds? That conventional wisdom has again been confirmed recently: since just before the election the UK equity market has risen by 9 per cent while long-dated gilts have climbed by about 5 per cent...

However, the value relationship between glits and equities is strained. With long gilts yielding some 9.1 per cent the crude yield gap between the two markets is now 4.4 per cent and the yield ratio is about 1.95. Already these numbers are at the lower edge of experience during the past 20 years. Equity salesmen argue hopefully that British shares are undervalued; but could we be about to emerge into an era of quite different relationships? There must be some kind of message in the high returns available on indexlinked gilts. At 4.5 per cent it is currently high enough to satisfy the nor-mal rate of return requirements of pension funds. Why buy equities on a dividend yield of only 4.7 per cent? You cannot reasonably expect to get a total return of more than about 6 per cent whether stock markets internationally will have to fall sharply in order that the prospective real returns on equities can be jacked up. In Japan the answer has clearly been "yes" and plenty of people are worried about the prospects for Wall Street on a dividend yield of under 3 per cent (though European valuations are generally less extreme). Internationally, real interest rates are 2 or 3 percentage points higher than the long-run 20th century average and if equity markets are forced to adjust there might be a 40 per cent tumble in share prices. In the event, Wadwhani uses elaborate arguments to come to the conclusion that this is very unlikely to happen, and it is more probable that share prices will in fact go modestly higher. He argues that in practice investors respond to nominal rather than real yields. Only if investors should wake up to real yields would there be serious trouble, he says. But here's a nasty thought: if inflation drops to zero, the real and nominal returns become the same, something which the dimmest investor could not overlook. Meantime Mark Cliffe and Chris Dillow of Nomura's London office have taken a closer look at the British situation. They point out that the yield gap quite quickly opened up 25 years ago from about nil to 4 or 5 per cent (just about what it is now) because sterling had become a weak currency, starting with the 1967 devaluation and continuing with the floating regime from 1971 onwards. In these conditions profits and dividends grew more strongly than before, making a wide yield gap logical. Now, however, we are effectively back in a fixed exchange rate framework; note that sterling in the past few days has been hoisted securely into the centre of the EMS grid. Profits could come under long-term pressure. In any case, one might add, British companies real on equities in the long run.

A fascinating paper by Sushil Wadhhave been overdistributing: dividend wani of Goldman Sachs starts by posing growth has already slowed to 3 per cent

STOCK MARKET theorists have their thinking caps on. After all, or European phenomenon – and asks over the past year, down from 18 per cent two years ago, and prospects are not good for at least the next year or two. We have already seen what has happened to investment property. where rentals have gone ex-growth and consequently prime commercial prop-erty now yields as much as gilts. What would happen if the yield gap closed and the equity yield had to match a gilt return of, say. 8 per cent (the rate on German bunds)? Why, British share prices would need to tumble by 40 per > f this analysis is right. British investors are making a serious mistake. They are looking backwards and are holding 1980s port-folios in the 1990s. With the All-Share Index this week poised to break through its all-time high of last Septem-ber the fund managers whose portfolios are stuffed with equities scarcely seem to have a care in the world (although the seasonally aware will note that May, when shares traditionally reach their sell-by date, is getting rather

> Now, it is easy to pick holes in this kind of speculative modelling. We have no reason to believe, for example, that profits in the UK will be constrained in the 1990s as seriously as they were in the 1960s: unemployment is much higher, the unions much weaker and in the absence of exchange controls the return on capital cannot diverge greatly from international levels. My own view is that falls in interest rates and inflation may be enough to keep the UK stock market relatively firm for the time being. Wall Street will also get political support from a friendly Fed ahead of the November election. But 1993 could be very different, as cyclical factors turn unfavourable for the securities markets. A 40 per cent fall in share prices seems an extreme view. Yet if governments are determined to pump out bonds in vast quantities at real interest rates of 4 or 5 per cent, stock markets are bound to have a very tough time.

In one day, indeed, the markets managed to pack in more excitement than most investors experienced in the whole of 1991. The events were not merely interesting in themselves, they also reflected some of the market's trends for the next few months. One such theme is the end of the UK recession, which showed up in two studies reported in Thursday's papers.

A survey by the British Chambers of Commerce showed that the services sector resumed growth in the first quarter for the first time since the recession started in mid-1990. And an IMF report said that Britain is about to move into recovery, with gdp growth between the fourth quarter of 1991 and that of 1992 forecast at 2.1 per cent.

Corporate financiers are doubtless hurrying to get take-over bids under way before the end of the recession pushes potential targets out of reach. One such deal came through on Thursday, as TI Group, the tubes and engineering company, offered paper worth £482m for Dowty Group, the aerospace components manufacturer.

if successful, the deal would nearly double TI's turnover overnight, though planned dis-posals would then reduce the combined company to a size roughly half as big again as the present group. Dowty has rejected the bid, but its weak performance in recent years hampers its defence tactics.

The offer was thought to be a relatively generous one by the market, intended perhaps to scare off any other potential bidders. At the moment it was made, the offer represented a price of 191p for every Dowty share, with a fully-underwritten cash alternative of 175p a share. At Wednesday's close, with rumours of the bid already in the market, Dowty was priced at 145p (up from 136p at the end of the previous week's trading), and TI Group at 716p. By the end of the week, TI had dropped to 669p. its bid was worth 178.4p, and Dowty was at 177p.

Smiths Industries, another aerospace components manufacturer which had also been seen as a potential bidder, weakened after the TI bid. with the market wondering if Dowty would turn to it as a potential white knight. Smiths recovered by Friday, however, and closed at 310p, up 1p on the week.

Another recession-induced eal was announced on Thursday: ICI swapped its fibres division for Du Pont's acrylics business and a chunk of cash. ICTs fibres operation has been problem area for years, but the group had hoped to turn it around with swingeing cost cuts. The recession put paid to those hopes, and they have gone to an owner with the necessary worldwide market position in this product area. The market responded favourably to the news: ICI closed the

The perception of an end to the recession - only slightly dented by poor trading comments from Abbey National and Legal and General - has led investors to think seriously about which sectors will benefit most from recovery. As the chart shows, the health and household sector of the FT-Actuaries All-Share index. dominated by the big drugs companies, has at last shed its role of inarket favourite. Sectors that might do better (or at least stop doing worse) if the economy picks up have performed notably more strongly in recent weeks - the chart shows examples such as Motors and Construction. Analysts at S.G. Warburg

Securities argued on Friday that the market was in danger of predicting the wrong sort of economic recovery, by bidding up capital spending stocks rather than those oriented to an upturn in consumer spending. An analysis of sector attractiveness from UBS Phillips & Drew reached a rather different conclusion: with economic growth likely to continue sluggish, it argued, the big boost to profits would come in those heavy manufacturing businesses which would benefit most from the cost cuts of the past year. The market's views on the speed of the recovery were influenced by two offsetting factors this week. One was the strength of sterling, which on Wednesday climbed decisively off the bottom of the ERM rankings. On the face of it, this left scope for a relatively speedy cut in base-rates, if the government wished.

This sentiment was badly affected, however, by Thursday's revelation of unexpect edly rapid growth in the German money supply. M3, the broader measure of money rose by 9.7 per cent in March nearly double the Bundes bank's target for the year. This reinforced the view that a decisive downwards move in UK interest rates - inevitably dependent on a similar move in Germany - was likely to be delayed. Torn between these two views, the stock market bounced briskly around on heavy volume, closing on Friday at 2643.0, up 2.8 points on Serious Money

Paying the price of mortgage certainty

By Philip Coggan, Personal Finance Editor

HOULD homeowners fix their mortgage rates? The building societies are falling over themselves to offer fixed rate deals at the moment, and those who suffered from the high rates of the late 1980s may be tempted.

But as a hardened cynic, my suspicion is that the time when fixed rate deals are widely available is the very time when borrowers should ignore them. Obviously, all depends on the future direction of interest rates. And while there may only be limited scope for rates to fall very far this year - the UK is at the mercy of the Bundesbank's determination to squeeze inflation out of the German economy - there is the chance of significant falls over the next couple of years. What sort of fixed rates are on offer? Alliance & Leicester is offering 9.99 per cent, fixed for two years; Bristol & West will lend at 10.5 per cent for two years, or 10.75 per cent for five; Cheshire will fix the rate at 9.39 per cent for six months, followed by 10.39 per cent till end 1997; the Chelsea is offering 10.25 per cent till September 1995; Cheltenham & Gloucester will lend at 9.9 per cent for two years; N&P is offering 10.75-10.85 per cent till 1995 or 1997; Nottingham Building Society is offering 9.1 per cent fixed till August 1, 1993; TSB will lend at 10.15 per cent for three years, or 10.25 per cent for five. In all cases, readers should check carefully for arrangement fees, compulsory buildings insurance, and restrictions on the type of mortgage which applies (some rates are only available on endowment or pension mortgages). Given that mortgage rates have been as high as 15.4 per cent within painful recent memory, all those rates may seem highly attractive. They also look good when one considers that the average interest rate on three month money

Margaret Thatcher came to power in 1979. But things may have changed for good following the UK's entry into the Exchange Rate Mechanism of the European Monetary System. If the ERM discipline works, then the UK should face a period of low growth, low inflation and low interest rates.

The key is what level of real rates (interest rates minus inflation) investors are prepared to accept. After a period of negative real rates in 1979-80, real rates have settled into a band between 4 and 8 per cent for much of the Conservatives' period in office. For the moment, with interest rates at 10.5 and retail price index inflation at 4 per cent, the real rate is 6.5 per cent

Now, of course, one can argue about the best index for measuring inflation. If one excludes mortgage payments, the inflation rate is a rather higher 5.7 per cent, reducing the real interest rate to 4.8 per cent. That is still a pretty High real rates, in essence, represent the level of investor fears of the prospects of future inflation. If investors expect inflation to come under control, at least in the medium term, then one would logically expect interest rates to fall.

eal rates might not fall dramatically. Simon Briscoe, analyst at Greenwell Montagu, believes that financial deregulation and the greater sophistication of consumers means a greater propensity to borrow. A price has to be paid for this, he argues, and that price is strongly positive real yields. Nevertheless, if real rates only fell to the bottom of the recent range (ie 4 per cent), then interest rates could easily drop to 8 per cent on current inflation levels. That indeed is the prediction of Greenwell has been 12.25 per cent since Montagu for the end of 1993 (although the broker's inflation forecast for that period is 3.5 per cent, implying a real rate of 4.5 per cent). Some encouragement for bor rowers may also be found in the gilts market. Traditionally, the yield on gilts has been higher than on short term deposits, to compensate investors for the risk of making a long term investment. This is known as a positive-sloping ince around 1984, however, short-term interest rates have been higher than yields on long gilts, creating what in the jargon is known as an "inverted" yield curve. In part this may have been caused by the government's healthy financial position in the late 1980s, which allowed it to repay many gilt issues. By creating a shortage of long gilts, this may have pushed gift prices up (and yields down). Now, however, the government is back in financial deficit and is set to sell around £2bn of gilts a month. Gilt yields, however, are only at 9-9.5 per cent, well below base

If the historical tradition repeats itself, and the yield curve becomes positive, or even merely flat, then there is scope for short term interest rates to fall to 9 per cent.

Even with the margin over base rates set by building societies, that means that mortgage rates could easily fall to 9.75-10 per cent. And if Greenwell Montagu is correct, then mortgage rates could be 8.75-9 per cent by the end of next

Of course, such optimistic predictions about inflation and interest rates may be wrong, and borrowers may well be attracted by the certainty that fixed rates provide. But they should be aware that such certainty may have its

Home orders picked up, and a British Chambers of Commerce survey showed substantially But Abbey National's share price endured a turbulent week. The stock had boomed after the election as worries about the housing market eased, but they were revived when Sir Christopher Tugendhat, the company's chairman, told Wednesday's annual general meeting that: "Arrears and repossessions are at a higher level than expected end this in turn will mean a higher level of provisioning." However, the 1,400 shareholders present, many of whom were also savers, did hear some good news. Sir Christopher also announced that the company's annual mailing will include "a special insert giving the rates for all our investment accounts, both current and unavailable. The leaflet directs customer's attention to those which are no longer available". So, anybody receiving a letter from the Abbey in the next few weeks would be well advised to read it — it might save them from continuing to leave money in a moribund account on a low

initial charge and an 1.25 per cent annual charge. Fillip for small companies

Small company shares have benefited from the general stock market euphoria since the re-election of the Conservative government. The Hoare Govett Small Companies Index (capital gains version) rose from 1119.96 on April 9 to 1206.61 on April 16, and 1219,13 by April 23, an 8.9 per cent increase since polling day. The County Smaller Companies Index rose from 889.31 to 950.51 and 961.61 over the same periods, an overall increase of 8.1 per cent.

The Weekend FT front page article on the Daily Telegraph on February 20 said that Mr Conrad Black bought control of the group for £30m. We should make it clear that after Mr Black bought a 14 per cent stake for £10m in May 1985, as the article explained, he later acquired control via diluting rights issues.

S THE first quar-terly reporting ommend should be held in stocks. Wein now thinks allequity portfolios should be 80 per cent in stocks, and not 85 per cent, and 20 per cent in cash. The Morgan Stanley strategist justified his shift on the grounds that he believes the recovery in the economy and in corporate earnings will not be strong enough to warrant stocks at current prices. Shearson's Sherman now suggests that a balanced portfolio should have 55 per cent in stocks, 40 per cent in bonds and 5 per cent in cash.

> Admittedly, Sherman said the changes reflected a "neutral" view of market prospects over the next six to nine months, rather than a wholly negative view. He also said the revision was based on an expectation that short-term interest rates could soon rise, which would undermine the attractiveness of equities relative to other short-term assets. His message: over the near term the market has potential for as much movement on the downside as on the upside.

While much has been said and written about fundamental market valuations stocks look pricey judged by trailing earnings, but affordable so long as future earnings prove as strong as forecast attention has switched to technical indicators, some of which suggest equities are

The number of stocks reaching 52-week highs has been steadily declining, an indica-tion of overheating, say analysts. Another bad sign is that the ratio of stocks that rise each day to those that fall appears to have peaked.

Then there is the issue of and the Nasdaq composite index - have been lagging the record-setting Dow Jones Industrial Average. The Dow is trading within a hair's breadth of its all-time high. primarily because investors have been so keen on big capitalisation cyclical stocks, while the S&P 500 and the Nasdaq composite languish some way below their records. Analysts would like to see the broader indices catch up with the Dow before calling the recent gains a deep and sustainable market rally. Even more worrying is the rise in long-term bond yields, which this week clambered back above 8 per cent as the Treasury market expressed its concern about inflation, the ever-growing budget deficit and supply pressure from the quarterly refunding round. With yields that high, and stock prices wobbling at historically expensive levels. yield-hungry investors could be lured from equities. Certain sectors have had

why the broader market indi-ces - the Standard & Poor's 500 good runs, none more so than the long-beleaguered banks, which hogged the limelight in a week that saw the comuletion of the biggest bank merger in US history - the marriage of BankAmerica and Security Pacific.

Financial sector analysts are increasingly positive about the outlook for bank earnings. Some argue that an end to the long crisis in the industry may be near. Judging by the latest quarterly results, that optimism may not be misplaced. This week Chase Manhattan led the way with a 20 per cent improvement in net income to $141m, followed by Citicorp, which posted doubled profits of $183m, way ahead of market expectations. Equally stellar performances came from Wells Fargo, BancOne, Bankers Trust and Chemical Banking.

The thing to do then was to put together a basket of ITV companies, picking your way around those displaying hazard signs. Forecasting genius was not needed to see that Thames Television was likely to face a potentially lethal threat from Carlton Communications; or that both TV-am and TVS Entertainment probably would have had to bet the shop to survive and would, therefore, not have been very attractive Ironically, TV-am decided while TVS did and still lost. But a basket of the others chosen in the near-certainty that the Independent Televi-sion Commission was unlikely to kick out the majority of existing contractors, and even more unlikely to get rid of more than two of the big five programme producers clearly would have produced dramatic results. Leaks that both Central and

Scottish had bid dramaticallylow sums - confirmed later as 22,000 a year apiece - put springs under the share price. Those who took notice were able to buy Central at around 625p in mid-July, a stock that is now trading at more than But what now? Is there any-

There is, however, another raft of ITV companies which made lowish bids - such as LWT's £7.58m - but which

Despite the continued uncertainty, and the threat of increasing competition in a multi-channel future, there are contentions services such as unmistakable signs that ITV companies can make at least ing facilities, artists' contracts savings without harming quality. The latest evidence for this emerged yesterday as Central announced that Andy Allan, its managing director of broadcasting, was joining the board of Carlton Television and that Carlton's chief executive, Nigel Warmsley, was joining the Central board. Cariton has a 20 per cent stake in Central. Central, in turn, has a 20 per cent stake and the right to two directors on the board of Meridian, which won the south of England franchise. The daisy chain stretches even further. LWT, Scottish and Carlton are also common shareholders in what was Sunrise and is now Good Morning. the breakfast franchise. those who invest in companies such as Central, LWT, Scottish or Anglia will not be dissatisfied in the longer term. For the romantics there is always TVS, which ceases to be a broadcaster at the end of this year. Its share price has just doubled to 7p. Apart from programme libraries in the US and the UK, the company's main asset is the determination of chairman Rudolph Agnew - the stubborn Irishman who once chaired Consolidated Gold Fields - to bring it back from the dead. Agnew is fired by what he sees as the lack of natural justice dispensed by the ITC. And that might make him worth a small each-way bet.

FINANCE AND THE FAMILY

Get in gear for growth if you believe in recovery

Philip Coggan on fund managers' strategies for UK equities

the ideal vehicle for the small investor the re-election of the Conservative government. But recent trends have not been encouraging.

The average trust in the sector has risen by a dismal 8.6 per cent over the past five years, even after the re-investment of income, Even over 10 years, the average growth fund has been outperformed by the average equity income fund.

There is an argument, however, that these trends will not continue in the 1990s. If membership of the European Monetary System's exchange rate mechanism creates a lowgrowth, low-inflation environment, then interest rates will fall. Returns on equities may but they will look good in real terms and compare well with the rates available from building societies.

Within the equity market, dividends now form quite a high proportion of corporate earnings, reducing the scope for many companies to increase payouts substantially. The search will be on for companies which can produce better-than-average profit growth; that ought to be the province of UK growth fund managers.

There are more than 150 unit trusts competing for investors funds in the UK growth sector, with some £7.3bn under management at the start of April. They range in size from Ark-wright Recovery, with under £1m, to M&G's massive Recovery fund which, at £750m-plus, is more than 10 per cent of the

Over a shorter time scale, one fund which has seen remarkable success is Pembroke, which is managed by the John Carrington group. Second over three years, it is top of the sector over both one and five years. Nigel Thomas, who co-man-

Joe Mottley, who manages the AIB Grofund equity trust (top over three years) with Eileen Fitzpatrick, attributes the success to running a concentrated portfolio of only 35 or so stocks. A similar strategy is cited by Duncan Trinder, who manages the British growth fund for Gartmore (third over three years). He has focused on only 25 or

LAST week, we highlighted a large sale in Polypipe, citing it as one of the few building material companies to have ironically, this week features a large sale in Spring Ram, the bathroom and kitchen specialist, which has proved itself adept at bucking the trend in that sector.

Last June, William Rooney, the chairman and co-founder, sold 22m shares at 105p. Since then, the share price has continued to rise, and Ronald Farr sold 1m shares at 162p. In terms of timing, it would be difficult to improve upon the sales of Donald Lewin. As chairman of Clinton Cards, a greeting card retailer, he sold a total of 500,000 shares in May last year at prices between 297p and 300p. In retrospect this marked the very peak for the shares, which have since fallen sharply. The company slipped into the red in the year ended January 1992.

Three other directors, including the managing director, have now bought a total of 60,000 shares at 60p, 80 per cent lower than the level at which their chairman sold.

For those who follow directors' dealings, Astec (BSR) has proved a rewarding invest-ment. Directors were buying at 10p in December, and accumulated more stock in January at around the 12-13p mark. The latest purchases were at 17p.

WE KEEP UP WITH THE ALL-SHARE INDEX. BUT FROM MAY 1ST

WE'LL BE WAY BEHIND ON CHARGES.

One of the safer ways to invest in UK equities is to track the FT-A Ali-Share Index. But only if you can follow it faithfully. Since launch, our UK Index Fund has performed within 0.15% of the index in 36 out of 38 months.

But beware: you should also keep track of the charges. From May 1st, Gartmore will drop its initial charge from 3.75% to zero. And, because there is only a 0.5% annual management fee, that makes it by

though the UK stock market fell that year - in hope of recovery. Shares did rise, but not nearly as much as expected Meanwhile, the new economic discipline of the exchange rate mechanism has forced actuaries to downgrade their forecasts for future returns. That, for many, meant bonus cuts.

This trend has been most marked on 10-year policies. These are not buoyed by the strong returns equities enjoyed in the late 1970s. Over 25 years - the term needed to back a mortgage - the trend is more muted. Norwich Union was the first office to declare and bonuses are funded by putting money into low-risk deposits, so fund managers must sacrifice their investment freedom to pay them. This helps to explain why Standard Life, with a traditionally high terminal bonus rate, has done very well in recent years - it has topped Money Management's 25-year survey since 1986. This also makes Commercial Union's jump into second place, only marginally behind Standard Life, look particularly impressive. If a monthly premium of £50 had been assumed, CU would even have overtaken Standard, according to Money Management. Meanwhile, when terminal bonuses are excluded, CU comes first in tion derives a surrender value - the life assurance term for the amount you will receive if you stop paying the premiums early and ask for a cash sum. The costs of running the policy including intermediaries' commission and administration charges - are loaded at the beginning of the term, so the value you will receive in the first five years of a 25-year policy is awful. But what about surrender values after 24 Last year's Money Marketing survey showed that these returns barely deserved to be called "with-profits" at all. Several companies offered only 40 per cent of what investors could get by hanging on for another year. This year, 19 of the 32 companies surveyed increased 24-year pay-outs. But the table, which shows 24-year values as a percentage of maturity values, still includes some figures that are hard to justify. CU's presence in the bottom five shows that conservative reversionary bonuses do not necessarily improve values if you surrender early.

What of underlying invest-ment performance? Past perfor-mance is never a guide to future prospects, as most readers will know, and the past year has seen a shake-up of the usual top payers. Last year, Money Management identified a "Magnificent Seven" offices based on the consistency of their performances. Standard tish Amicable and Scottish Widows are still in the 25-year top 10 but Tunbridge Wells, Norwich Union and Clerical Medical are not.

On Clay & Partners' survey. four companies have been in the top 10 over all time periods this year and last. They are Friends Provident, Standard Life, Scottish Amicable and Royal London. Make of all these figures what you will.

Some patterns are clearer. Guardian Royal Exchange's performance shows an alarming consistency over all periods - according to Money Marketing, GRE has the worst endowment pay-out over 10, 15 and 25 years. Over five years, it also has the worst pension performance, with an annualised yield of -1.8 per cent. In other words, after five years its fund is worth less than the total value of premiums paid in.

Money Marketing also has valuable data on pension contracts and with-profits bonds, both of which have seen feverish marketing over the past few years. Reduced pay-outs have fed through to pensions, broadly in line with the trend for endowments. But the offices at the top of the tables tend to be pension specialists which do not figure in the endowment tables. Scottish Equitable heads the league for personal pensions since the start of July 1988, when they were introduced, with Equitable Life, Sun Life and Pearl all showing prominently. Over 10 years (using figures self-employed pension contracts), a £1,000 single premium would now have grown to £6,303 with Pearl, £6,191 with Scottish Life and £5,483 with Scottish Equitable. Assuming monthly premiums of £35 over the same period, Pearl would offer the best pay-out, of £15,131, followed by Scottish Amicable on £12,619 and Norwich Union on £12,451 Clay & Partners sounds a note of caution on with-profits bonds. These take a single premium, and bonuses are added each year in the usual fashion. But offices reserve the right to make "market value adjustments" if you surrender early at a time when the market is falling. As security is the big attraction of these bonds, compared with unit trusts these problems could be critical.

Equitable Life and Legal & General were the only offices surveyed which gave precise dates at which they guaranteed not to apply a MVA. At the fifth and each subsequent anniversary, the Equitable guarantees there will be no downward adjustment, while L&G makes a similar guarantee for the 10th anniversary.

The judgement of John Jenkins, insurance partner with Clay & Partners, is unequivocal. "I think there is an area here which independent advis-ers are overlooking in not attaching enough importance to the guarantee," he says. "I would regard these offices' products as fundamentally better than the others, for that

Debbie Harrison on the switch to fee-based advisers

ECENT concern over the role of commissionbased advisers in the oension transfer market has led an increasing number of consumers to seek fee based

In 1991 alone, new business for individual single premium pensions was valued at £4.2bn - a 250 per cent rise on the 1989 figure, and due mainly to sales of personal pension transfer plans. At the same time, regulators found that the number of complaints about transfers increased dramatically.

There are three basic options built up a pension benefit in a former employer's scheme, only one of which involves transferring the benefit to an insurance-based product such as a personal pension. The first two options - namely, leaving the benefit in the old scheme, and transferring the benefit to the new employer's scheme may not be considered fully, if at all, by a salesman who sales of products.

The division between fee and commission based advisers is not always clear-cut. For example, many firms charge a modest fee but retain a percentage of the commission. This hybrid charging structure can be one of the most difficult to understand, and leaves plenty-ofscope for pulling the wool over a client's eyes.

depends on commission from

To give an idea of the cost to the consumer it is worth putting a price on the two main ways of paying for advice. Fee based advisers charge anything from £50-£250 an hour depending on whether you go to a local high street adviser or a leading firm of consulting actuaries. As a rough guide, however, you can expect to pay £80-£130 an hour for good pensions advice with an overall minimum of about £300-£500. depending on the nature of the case and the seniority of the

If this sounds like a lot of money, consider how much a commission based adviser might receive on the sale of a personal pension used to take a transfer value of £50,000. Most providers pay about 5.6 per cent of the value of the transfer in commission. In this example, the cost would be

£2,800. Looking at these figures, it is hard to justify the life industry's argument that consumers feel more comfortable with commissions.

Where the hybrid charging structure is used, an adviser might make a modest charge of, say, £200 and offer to rebate "100 per cent of Lautro commission." The old Lautro commission rate for transfers was 4 healthy commission on the product sold.

In the example given of a transfer value worth £50,000, worth £300 which, when added to the fee, gives the adviser £1,000 for selling a personal

Mitchell Philpott, director of Norex communications, says: "Given the general paucity of 'The number of complaints about transfers rose dramatically ' understanding of pension transfers, coupled with the growth of this market, we do not believe commission based advisers can demonstrate impartial advice." Of course, it is wrong to suggest that the consumer is guaranteed expert advice by going to a fee based firm. Clearly, the firm also must specialise in pensions and be able to demonstrate at the first interview that the analysis will include: A thorough examination of the benefit options of the previous company scheme.

■ What the new employer's scheme offers in terms of benefits. In particular, it could offer good inflation proofing and excellent protection for the scheme member's family in the form of widows' and children's pensions.

benefit structure of the previous scheme. If the scheme offers 5 per cent inflation proofing and widow's benefits, the personal pension quotation also must do so. If a life office quotation ignores these benefits, it can offer a much higher projected pension.

If a transfer value is recommended, check that the comper cent, so this means that mission charged is related in the adviser is still getting a full. Where the commission exceeds the fee - as will often be the case with a transfer the excess commission should be returned to the client, either as a cash refund or in the form of enhanced policy terms. If the latter is preferred, check that the entire amount is re-invested in the policy.

If the fees charged by actuarial firms are beyond your means, it is worth using the register of fee based advisers run by the monthly Money Management magazine*. Its data bank holds details of more than 1,440 firms and has handled more than 4,000 inquiries since it was launched less than 18 months ago. Money Manage ment will send a free list of six firms in your area and the details supplied include a contact name. One adviser on the register. Fraser Marr Financial Services, charges between £80 and £150 an hour depending on the seniority of the consultant and whether the business is conducted by the London office or one of its regional branches. Tony Murrell, the managing director, says: "Where the com mission generated exceeds the fee charged, we either rebate the excess to the client in the form of a cheque or ask the product provider to enhance the value of the policy." Russell Kitchen, managing director of Personal and Corpo rate Financial Planning Ltd (also on the register), offers cli ents the same choice and adds: "The important point about fee charging is that the advice is separated from the end result."

FINANCE & THE FAMILY

How to . . . prepare for living abroad / John Authers Financial guidelines for exiles always greener over there. But there are opportunities to profit from leaving this country and working or retiring

Financial considerations alone are unlikely to force you into leaving the country, but it could be lucrative, if you plan your finances carefully.

According to Hill Samuel Investment Services there are around 3.5m British expatriates working abroad: 20 per cent in Europe, 26 per cent in Africa, and 51 per cent in North America.

If you are staying with your employer, and are only leaving the country on an overseas assignment, the tax position can be very complicated. Fortunately, a new leaflet from the Inland Revenue (Going to Work Abroad? IR58) offers guidelines on the possibilities.

Those who are abroad for a complete tax year (from April 6-one year to April 5 the next) and work full-time wholly outside the UK have a relatively easy time. Providing they do not make visits to the UK which average 91 days or more per year, they will be treated as not resident in the UK for tax purposes.

If you are away for 365 days or more, but this does not include a complete tax year, life is more of a headache. You may get a "foreign earnings deduction" of 100 per cent of your earnings for this period. This is Revenue-speak for saying your earnings will be free

You can make return visits to the UK during a period abroad which qualifies for the deduction, but no single visit may last for more than 62 consecutive days and the total number of days spent in the UK must not be more than one sixth of the number of days in the entire qualifying period.

This means that you will not always know at the time whether a given day, or period, can be counted as part of a qualifying period. The more certain you are about your travelling plans in advance, therefore, the better for your financial health. If your period working on it.

abroad does not extend for 365 days, you will almost certainly be liable to tax in the UK in the normal way.

The greatest financial opportunities occur if you are away for more than one tax year. You will also need to find out about your new country's tax regime; there is obviously no financial point in moving to a high tax country. And you must work out your plan in

If you are selling assets and going to work abroad, it would be preferable not to complete the sale until after you have left the UK. Great care is required in this area and professional advice should be sought. Also defer income. where possible, until you are non-resident. If a gain is realised while you are still onshore, you will pay UK tax

Those without a large capital gain still have a formidable financial shopping list:

Your House. This can be a painful problem. Eric Le Rossignol, managing director of Hill Samuel Investment Services' Jersey operation, explains that the rental income after deductions, if you let it, will be subject to UK tax. So the cost of hiring a good local estate agent is justified. If the agent receives the rents and pays the expenses, the amount on which the UK tax must be withheld can be reduced, according to Le Rossignol. Ask a solicitor to draw up a

As their name implies, these funds accumulate, or "roll-up" funds, and do not distribute income. If you can afford to do so, it is worth putting money into such funds well before leaving the UK, as you can then withdraw

Savings. Liberation from the UK tax regime allows various opportunities. As Higgins puts it: "The whole point of being offshore is that you have not got a UK tax problem, and you can start choosing investments the way investments should be chosen. You just don't need to worry about tax." Offshore centres have developed a formidable range of mutual funds, allowing broad investment. As these funds have a favorable tax position, they should, while they stay offshore, generally be able to beat onshore unit trusts and life products.

Higgins suggests using offshore personal bonds, such as that offered by Royal Life International on the Isle of Man, as a shell for bolding investments. Set-up fees need not be prohibitive if you use a non-commission product, he says, and you can then manipulate the funds held within them - they could even be used to hold building society accounts. However, the tax position of these bonds is under review. and administrative costs can become prohibitive - other advisers, such as Wilfred T. Fry of Worthing, are much more dubious about them.

that distributor funds are a good home for savings as they normally offer automatic reinvestment of dividends, but will protect against liability for UK income tax on accumulated gains, if the saver has to return unexpectedly to the UK. m Pensions. Many offshore products which call themselves pensions" are just glorified and over-priced savings schemes, according to Higgins. On-shore pension investment is usually only attractive for tax reasons in any case. However, pensions under

Le Rossignol also points out

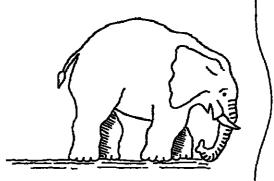

Section 49 of the Isle of Man Income Tax Act 1970 are attractive for those who know they will be returning to the UK, because if taken as pension income, the annuity will be taxed like a normal annuity, rather than a "compulsory purchase" or "pension" annuity. This significantly reduces the amount of tax you need to pay. Le Rossignol says it is worth continuing to pay Class 3 insurance contributions to ensure eligibility for a state pension when you return. He adds that those who do not know their employment prospects when they return might be best to advised to save their employer's annual bonuses and review the situation later

UK pension law, for example is prone to frequent changes This explains why most offshore products are single, rather than regular premium. Investment offshore is never risk-free, so beware inflated claims. As Le Rossignol puts it: "Common sense rules on risk

STILL PUSHING BEYOND THE RECESSION

As the recession lingers on, a yield of 6.1% is something to be proud of.

That's what you could currently expect from Stewart Ivory's British Fund.

A recent survey* places us, yet again, in the top 12 income unit trusts. The same survey shows that our dividends have grown by 99% over the last five years - and we're not about to stop pushing now. We've maintained our capital growth, too.

Over a 10-year period to 31 December 1991, your initial £1,000 investment in the British Fund would have grown to £3,821.

How have we done it? By concentrating on companies with strong management and good cashflow. And if they can produce 6.1% for us now, spare a thought for when the good times return....

If you'd like to know more about the Stewart Ivory British Fund please write to us at Stewart Ivory Unit Trust Managers Ltd, 45 Charlotte Square, Edinburgh EH2 4HW. Or telephone 031 226 3271.

Please bear in mind that the value of units and the income from them may fluctuate and past performance is not necessarily a guide to their future performance.

How loans can save tax

panies can bring tax and interest savings. but you need to plan ahead, write Ian Grant and Tony Foreman.

Sometimes, when clients have made loans to a nephew's business or a son-in-law's company, they find the business has folded and the loan will have to be written off. The lender's first thought is that tax relief might mitigate some of the financial loss.

The sad thing about these situations is that, very often, tax relief could have been available if the loan had been set up in the right way, The basic difficulty is that a loan is not normally a chargeable asset for capital gains tax purposes. Originally, this meant that a loss on such a loan being written off was not allowable for CGT purposes. The law was changed some years ago; now, section 136 of the Capital Gains Tax Act 1979 gives relief where a lender. makes a loss on a loan extended to a person carrying on a trade in the UK. But relief is available only if

Such a loan usually will qualify as a "debt on security," which means that it is a chargeable asset for CGT pur-

Because it is convertible it does not fall within the definition of a qualifying corporate bond (on which no CGT relief is available). If the loan has to be written off, the allowable loss for CGT purposes is

This still does not give income tax relief. A canital loss can be set only against capital gains, which may be in short supply at present. There is, however, a way in which income tax relief can be

The secret is to put money into a private company by way of redeemable participating preference shares rather than as a loan. You should bear in mind that, in commercial terms, there will often be little to choose between the two types of investment.

Whether you put in money as loan stock or participating preference shares, normally you will find that, if there is a liquidation, you rank for pay ment only after secured credi tors and the banks have been paid off. Very often, that will leave nothing for anyone else. But if there is, then a preference shareholder will have higher priority than ordinary

A participating preference share is a special type of preference share where the holder is entitled to a fixed dividend plus a variable one. The variable element can be quite small, so that shares would qualify as participating preference shares if they carried a right to a fixed dividend of 9 per cent plus a variable dividend of 1p for every £1 dividend paid to ordinary share-

Why does the fact that shares are participating preference shares make so much difference? The reason is that they count for tax purposes as "ordinary share capital."

Where a person has sub-scribed for ordinary share capital in a private trading company, and the shares eventually prove to be worthless, he can claim income tax relief under section 574 of the ICTA 1988.

THE TABLE shows capital gains tax allowances for assets sold in March. To use it, multiply the original cost of the assets by the figure shown for the month in which you bought them.

If you subtract the result from the proceeds of your sale, the difference will be your taxable gain or loss. Suppose that you bought shares for £6,000 in February 1986 and sold them in March 1992 for £13,500. Multiplying the original cost by the February 1986 figure of 1.415 gives a total of £8,490.

Subtracting that from the proceeds of £13,500 gives a gain for tax purposes of £5,010 - below the 1991-92 £5,500 CGT allowance. If you realised no other gains during the year. the profit should be tax-free. If you are selling shares bought before April 6, 1982, use the March 1982 figure.

SCHEME that will enable investors. even those with small amounts of capital, to invest collectively in second-hand endowment policies (Sheps) is to be launched soon by Policy Managers Ltd. a subsidiary of Collective Investments Ltd.*

Investor interest in buying existing with-profit endowments is growing apace, particularly for contracts with only a few years to maturity. And although a recent article highlighted the merits of investing in second-hand endowments, it also pointed out certain possible disadvantages, namely: ■ Lack of flexibility in the investment. The investor has to select it from the list offered period or the exact amount to be invested. Unless the investor has considerable capital, he cannot spread his investments over a period or with several life com-

by the marketmakers. He cannot pick the exact investment

■ The strong demand for second-hand endowments means investors have very little time to make a suitable selection. Often, they are beaten to it by

Investments required tend to be for large amounts. There are comparatively few endowments available to small inves-

Investors have to make further payments by meeting the premiums on the endowment until it matures and they get the maturity value. Stephen Jones, an executive director of Collective Invest-

Eric Short on second-hand endowment policies ments, has designed a scheme. But the managers will set aside the managers are negotiating to overcome these disadvantages and to open up the second-hand endowment market to more people.

The plan is classified under the Financial Services Act as unregulated collective investment scheme, but its structure is quite straightforward. It will operate as an open-ended fund on a unitised basis similar to an unauthorised unit trust. Investment will be via the usual method of buying and selling units.

The fund will invest in second-hand endowments through the established marketmakers. Although the intention of the managers is to hold the endowments until maturity, they could be sold back to the marketmakers if conditions warrant. The managers intend concentrate on buying endowments from around 15 selected life companies with good bonus prospects. Collective Investments will not itself be a marketmaker, thereby avoiding any conflicts of interest. Neither will it hold a box of cashed-in units. All these will be cancelled automatically and fresh units created for incoming investors. a sufficient amount of the money which has been invested to meet future premiums on the purchased

fund for Sheps

In addition, the fund will hold an adequate liquidity margin in order to meet re-purchases without being forced to sell endowments. This money will be held in a separate, interest-earning Policy Managers is still discussing whether to operate the pricing on the usual bid/ offer basis or to follow the trend in the unit trust industry and have a single pricing system. But the basic price will relate to the market value of the endowment portfolio and the cash held.

Although Policy Managers will be calculating the prices itself each week, the valuation will be based on the market rates of return achieved by the Foster & Cranfield auction prices. Foster & Cranfield will act as adviser on the pricing and selection of endowments.

The managers reserve the right to expand the margins or freeze the price if there is a very high value of redemptions within a very short period. But make gifts to their children. Normally, the income from such gifts is aggregated with the parent's income (usually that of the father) and children cannot use their tax allowances.

Under this scheme, though there is no income, so it can be gifted by parents to children. On eash-in, the child should be able to use the exemption to offset the CGT liability.

Since this scheme is classified as an unregulated collective investment plan. Collective Investments can market it only through authorised intermediaries (although it can deal direct with experienced investors through customer service agreements). But, generally, potential investors applying direct to Policy Managers would be given a list of names of independent financial advisers in their locality.

Being a new investment concept, it has taken considerable time to set up the scheme and obtain the necessary approval from Imro. But Collective Investments hopes to start trading within a few weeks. The intention is that people will be able to invest from £2.500 upwards.

If this scheme is successful, Stephen Jones is exploring the feasibility of offering dated funds where the units would be redeemed at a certain date in the future. He has his eye on the school fee planning market.

An EZ life ends

ONDON'S Docklands moves into uncharted territory

y our transfer of the state of

From tomorrow, the area loses the enterprise zone status it won on April 26 1992. This does not necessarily harm the opportunities for investors to take advantage of tax concessions — measures announced before Christmas and likely to be enacted in the new Finance Act allow investors to profit from EZ tax concessions for up to two years after a building first comes into use. But life will be more hectic for the tenants of Docklands buildings (or at least, those who pay the rents) because rates will now be payable even if, like many Docklands buildings, there is no occupant. According to John Harrison, of Investment and Tax Publishing Services, an expert on enterprise zone taxation, the precise level at which rates are levied could be controversial, because there is no clear base of comparison. Rates may not be as high as they are in the City of London, for example, and there might also be a case for keeping rateable values low until the public transport infrastructure is fully in place.

Times are hard for Docklands developers in any case.

as the much-publicised difficul-ties of Olympia & York, responsible for the Canary Wharf A number of Docklands EZTs have problems. Last week PET 8, launched in 1989 and the big-gest EZT of all, asked to defer its rent payments to investors. Globe Trust, the private property company which guar-anteed the rental income, blamed the downturn in commercial rents and values for its difficulties. The trust owns ent only 40 per cent let. Investors who borrowed to finance their EZT investment could be seriously affected by delays in rent collection they could lose the tax relief available if rental income is used to pay off the loan. The advent of rates will not make it any easier for Globe to meet its obligations.

Confusion also reigns over CET 7, sponsored by IPS, who also sponsored Olympia & York's Cabot Square Trust. CET7 was launched at the end of the last tax year to buy part of One Exchange Tower. It needed £26.3m, but according to Property Enterprise Managers, which handled the administration, only £12m was underwritten, which means that investors' money may need to be refunded. Negotiations are continuing to complete the deal. However, at present, according to PEM, "the trust has been formed so that investors have units effectively allocated." But it is a matter of getting the deal in the form the prospectus led them to expect, PEM adds. "And if it doesn't work like that, allowing them to withdraw." An injection of cash for One Exchange Tower might help meet the rent on Two Exchange Tower, but the situation should become more clearer in the coming weeks.

The outlook, now Docklands is no longer an enterprise zone, could be gloomy. As Harrison says: "If they can find tenants and let the buildings then the developers are off the hook. If they can't then they are stuck with paying the rent and from next week a potential charge for rates as well. That could be the last straw for some people. "Against that, interest rates could be coming down and the banks might allow some leeway. That's the balancing

Originally the authority was prepared to levy this charge against the society and the society was prepared to accept it, but it now seems that the society is seeking to avoid payment, claiming that my daughter, although denied access to the property or any say in its disposal, is legally responsible as the freeholder. ■ We think the council is correct. Your daughter is responsible for the standard charge on the empty property law against her neighbour. She remains the owner of the empty property, and is entitled to any surplus money if there were to be a sale at a price exceeding the mortgage loan plus interest.

Driveway dispute

THE driveway of my mother's home is adjacent to the pathway of her neighbour's at the boundary line, though it is higher by some 18 inches. The neighbours have allowed the concrete surface of their pathway to crack. Rain has caused movement of the underlying soil, lowering the surface of the pathway and exposing and moving the soil beneath my mother's driveway, which has cracked. A large portion of the otherwise well-constructed driveway will have to be and replaced. Has my mother any claim for negligence? Are there legal safeguards she can adopt to prevent a further ■ If the damage is caused by natural seepage of rainwater which has not been artificially collected by the concrete your mother would have no claim in position might be different if the pathway itself supported your mother's driveway and had been in place, with that effect, for more than 20 years.

Tax on interest

EARLY in 1991 I raised a considerable sum by taking out a loan. The sum has been earning interest while waiting to be used. This interest, say the tax authorities, attracts higher rate tax. No allowance has been granted in respect of the interest payable. I have appealed, but the tax inspector has ruled against me and I have had to pay the demand.

The tax inspector is right.

Tax relief in these circumstances was abolished in 1974 (following restrictions imposed in 1972). În a reference library, you will find the current restricted relief for loan interest in sections 353 to 368 of the Income and Corporation Taxes Act 1988. Look for the British Tax Encyclopedia, British Tax Legislation, Simon's Taxes, or Tolley's Taxation Service.

IN MARCH you wrote that probate could be granted but that there should be a record of any gift to the daughter of a beneficial interest in bank and building society accounts. What would constitute a record? A deed, a simple written expression of intent? A difficult shareholder

REFORK 1982, we purchased a freehold retail outlet at a value based primarily on property. At the end of 1985 one of the shareholders parted company, resulting in transfer of his shares to my wife. Allowing for the potential CGT liability, and calculating the absolute nett value of the shares, mainly based on the property value, we agreed a consideration sum for the share value, albeit unhappily. In March 1988, when the chancellor abolished liability to CGT on pre-1982 gains, the ex-shareholder demanded his share of the potential CGT saving. He has no rights after the shares were transferred, but because of heavy pressures and unbearable tension I have agreed to resolve the matter by paying him his share of the retained CGT liability.

Casebook Why widows need watchdogs are still getting away with the old trick of cutting interest rates on their accounts without telling customers - in spite of a welter of bad publicity last year, including a judgment by the building societies ombudsman against the Nationwide

But when money has been left in an account in trust, often for a widow, the trick is easy to accomplish and rates of interest paid can be very low. Solicitors administering these trusts need to look for income, so they prefer accounts which pay interest monthly. This restricts choice. Even though money deposited in this form must be very much a "safe earner" for the societies, they still do not rush to make sure that their elderly cilents are receiving the best interest available for their For example, one solicitor conducted a review of the trust funds he administered, and found the following rates of interest were being offered: # 1.69 per cent on £3,000, by Abbey National; ■ 1.73 per cent on £2,000, by Alliance & Leicester, ■ 2.475 per cent on £3,000 by Birminham Midshires:

■ 2.25 per cent on £3,000 by ■ 2.63 per cent on £5,000 by Woolwich: ■ 3.75 per cent on £500 by Nationwide Anglia; and

■ 2.25 per cent on £500 by Hali-

■ 4.43 per cent on £5,000 by Bristol & West. When prompted, the societies were able to offer some

UILDING societies improvement. The solicitor said: "In every case, the society was able to recommend another of their accounts giving better rates of interest but usually these provided for annual income only - which I feel is not appropriate for trusts where there is a life tenant entitled to the income - or periods of notice of two or three months unless minimum balances of £5,000 or £10,000 were maintained." The best compromise seems to be the "High 30" account offered by Bristol & West, which currently pays a gross 8.51 per cent annual rate on balances of more than £500, but requires 30-day notice. Market Harborough offers a similar account with interest of 8.05 per cent. This is apparently the most suitable account for widows holding trust funds at

Otherwise, building societies dislike the costs of administration for such small sums, and most of the options available come in the form of "current accounts" which are not suitable for saving.

According to Blay's Guides, the top rates for monthly interest with immediate access are 7.95 per cent from Woolwich, 7.72 per cent from Bristol & West, 7.44 per cent from Swansea, and 5.85 per cent from Coventry.

It might not seem that difficult for a society to provide extra flexibility for elderly widows, who often find the income from these small accounts invaluable. But perhaps they are more interested in an easy way of making a profit . . .

As tourists pour in to Spain, Jimmy Burns explains how to escape Expo and Olympic hype was looking for just a. few kilometres south of Seville on a narrow road off the motorway to Cadiz It was a village called Cabezas Blancas (White Reads), appropriately the first stop along what Spaniards have termed the route of the white towns.

I had left behind me a city that was cracking up under the strain of Expo and found a little village of white-washed houses where old men lounged in doorways and children chased each other in and out of trees. The atmosphere had been transformed. There was no hurry, just a seemingly endless time to talk and drink under the sun.

Beyond, the road took me through fields of cotton and sunflowers gracefully bowing to the light, with not a human in sight. In spring these fields are speckled in yellow and red: sunflowers in full bloom and poppies. It is hard to imagine that such a pastoral scene was the setting for some of the bloodiest battles between infi-del and £1 Cid during the Moorish occupation of Spain. The villages and towns that line the route, and the castles in between, are nevertheless very Moorish indeed; the white towns are perched high on hills, clinging to the landscape defensively. There are more than a dozen white towns to visit. Among them, Arcos de la Frontera deserves its reputation as one of the most picturesque towns to be found in Andalucia. The town is perched high on a ridge, overlooking a river. Its narrow streets are flanked by small squat houses. Gothic churches, friendly topas bars and little palaces are hidden in alleyways.

'I watched the swallows swoop over the valley as the sun set'

There are plenty of cheap hotels on the route, but after a couple of hours' driving through the hills I opted for the graceful Reina Victoria Hotel-in Ronda because the poet Rainer Maria Rilke drew his inspiration there.

I booked a room just beneath his and from there watched the swallows swoop over the valley as the sun set, like a melting gold coin behind the granite hills. Rilke likened the dramatic gorge which separates the old and new town to St Christopher carrying the baby Jesus on his shoulders. Crossing the bridge, we left behind the bustle of the new Ronda with its busy commercial life, and entered a part of the town which had survived the years largely untouched and unal-

We followed the path deep into the gorge, to the Moorish baths. They were closed to the public but we convinced Juan, an old gardener, to let us in. He told us that the baths had been closed because a young tourist had tripped on the narrow path, fallen, and broken a leg. While my companion stayed at the top, I followed Juan along the fateful track, peering ahead as best I could.

Juan was anxious to show me the fountain because it was here that they shot the scene of Carmen washing herself in Rossini's film of the opera. Clutching his hand scythe, Juan told me that his job now was to clean away the brambles and weeds where lizards lurked.

As we stood under the surviving arches, I surveyed the remains of the drainage, the simple but logical way the baths had been laid out, the use of shadow and thick walls to create a perfect mild temperature for us to lounge in.

Juan looked up at the ramparts: "You know they built that without concrete and it's still standing after all these years. I dont know how they

On our walk to the baths we had passed a couple of English girls. "Cross-breeding seems to be a Spanish trait", one of them remarked as they walked past a bundle on the cobble stones. The bundle was a litter of kittens, of various sizes and shades ranging from ginger to black. They had been abandoned in the heat. When we were bidding our goodbyes. I pointed to the cats and remarked that they would die unless someone packed them

"Hay que ver", Juan said. These people who take away

BEGAN to find what I the children from their natural mother. They should be ashamed of themselves," Juan promised to take them with him to his village high up in the sierra where other cats lived amidst the hills. And so we left Juan gazing beyond the Morrish baths at the kittens on the cobblestones, and headed back towards the new town built by the Christians. We visited the bullfight museum. Here bullfighting was elevated to the realm of ritual, the garments and instruments of the toreadores laid out like relics: a glorification of death. There was a ticket to the bull-fight the day Manolete was killed. Some exhibits were pure pastiche: a cape with an Aztec sun and a naked body of the tortured Christ rising up into

There were portraits of Ordonez with Orson Welles and Hemingway. The director of the museum was as protective of his exhibits as the curate of his local Virgin. Indeed, there is a similarity that links the two cults - ritual and unquestioning devotion.

Near the bullring there is an old Carmelite church. We went there to buy some cakes. Next to a picture of the Virgin Mary a price-list referred to a variety of sweet delicacies polvorones (crumble cakes), pestinos (sweet fritters), cocadas (coconut cakes) magdalenas and mudagas (cup cakes). I made out my order for a quarter of a kilo each. I communicated with an anonymous nun through a dumbwaiter encrusted in the medieval stone. The nun's muffled, slightly ageing voice repeated each order like a litany before quoting the total price. I deposited the money.

The dumbwaiter twirled and for a few moments I was without cakes and without money. But there was faith in the air. The dumbwaiter twirled again and the cakes appeared neatly packaged in plastic. Each bag carried the inscription (in Spanish): "How beautiful it is to have an ideal in life."

A noble sentiment, indeed, although it was difficult to forget that every sweet morsel made by these Christian nuns had its origins in Moorish kitchens, before the Moors were booted out.

We had been told that one of the curiosities to glimpse along the route was the Spanish fir the pinsopo - a rare tree not found anywhere else. We would have seen several hun-dred as we made our way along the mountain road were it not for a large forest fire, caused by a stray piece of rubbish, which for two days engulfed an entire sierra. We saw thick sandy-coloured smoke rising over the horizon. The local radio described the fire as the worst ecological disaster to hit the area in 25

After his wanderings round Europe, Rilke had found his peace here. Writing to Rodin in November 1912, he had reflected on how much Spain had to give him. "Ronda is incomparable", he had marvelled.

Rilke's room in the Reina Victoria was a poet's room. simple and contemplative: a small desk with two fountain pens, a small library of books and a window giving out to the sunset. Yes, Ronda with its sense of timelessness, its beauty, its hidden mysteries, ficult to beat.

We left Seville shrouded in the pink of dawn, its new airport a monstrous carbuncle of futuristic architecture, a kind of 21st century hangar with blue arches made of some undesirable synthetic material. The spirit of Expo chased me all the way down the runway like a rampant bull At Barcelona airport I was greeted by the Olympian bull. Redesigned and expanded into a bubbling international ren-dezvous, the airport now provides another futuristic nightmare made worse by an inexplicable shortage of toilets.

There was a quickened pace about the airport which grew in intensity as we drove on to the motorway. There were places to eat but all that was being sold was fast food. Over the motorway a computerised clock marked the countdown to the opening day of the Olympics, lest anyone forgot. At this pace, I thought, there will be a collective burn-out before anyone gets to the starting line.

At Blanes, the Costa Brava's first frontier town, I got stuck in a terrible traffic jam. The heat was sweltering. We diverted to the nearest fast food snack bar. An assortment of chickens, french fries and hamburgers were displayed in coloured photographs behind the bar.

I pointed to each in turn, only to be told that nothing was available. I pointed to some bars of chocolate and some crisps. I was served crisps and Fanta reluctantly. and the man glowered when I spilt the Fanta. I told him that I would complain to the Olympics board – and I did.

We were soon driving along the Costa Brava. The road between Blanes and Lloret de Mar became increasingly twisty, meandering through spectacular pines, the sea luminous. Unfortunately, one of my ssengers was sick all over

Lloret de Mar and neighbouring Tossa were crowded with tonrists - mainly British. arrogant and badly dressed. lounging in cafés. To think that this was a quaint fishing town before Ava Gardner made film here in the 1950s, I

San Feliu was anti-climatic.

'Beyond San Feliu the developers had bulldozed my memories'

It was here that I had spent five idyllic summers as a child, and was revisiting for the first time in 30 years. We stopped for lunch by the quayside. It was much as I remembered it as a boy - the oil on the water's surface, the bits of rubbish floating between the rocks. Yes, there was pollution in those days, but no one seemed to mind so much. Now there was a self-conscious sign by the local authorities declaring the port to be a green zone. Beyond San Feliu, the developers had bulldozed my memo-ries. The fields of corn had sprouted apartment blocks. It was lucky that we had rented a house in Aiguabrava, the most beautiful and secluded spot along the Costa. The house was set up high on a hill. Its construction was a veritable rabbit warren of paths and patios and hidden rooftops. Plants and creepers of every kind and colour covered it.

Mornings and evenings were the best times to admire the beauty of the scene. At night under a yellow moon the pines swayed, and the wind swept the hills. The air was heavily perfumed with the smell of thyme and pine.

The next day we went down to the nearest beach as the sun rose. There was already another couple. She was massaging her partner's back with lascivious intent. As the morning wore on, the beach got crowded with more and more topless women massaging their partners and vice versa. There was an array of differing human forms I scarcely imag-

I thought it all most natural, this baring of breasts in and out of the water, among the sun-shades, ice-creams and suntan lotions, the children struggling with their flippers like unruly penguins. My female companion dismissed it all as a mix of exhibitionism, male chauvinism and menopause. We left the beach by mid-day. By then all sense of individuality had been surrendered. The aspect of nakedness struck me as one enormous expanse of flab, as immobile under the sun as a beached whale. After a day of this, I felt it was time to search for Dali. We drove to the village of Cadaques which the painter thought embodied "the most incomparable beauty on earth." It was at Cadaques, Dali tells us in his autobiogra-phy, that he had perfected his awareness of his situation.

As we drove down from the hills, Cadaques looked unlike any other town that straddles the Costa Brava. It is not really a town, more a village; unlike the others it has not spread its tentacles along the coast. Its compactness strikes one immediately, as does its whiteness. The local Dali museum has a wonderful model of a 1920s bus. Dali sits in red hat and red scarf in the driver's seat, looking quite lunatic, of course; his wife Gala is beside him, bewitching in a purple velvet dress.

Behind them are Picasso (the man Dali most thought about after his father), Marcel Duchamp (the man who painted a moustache on the Mona Lisa), and Lorca (who let Dali fondle his knee once), looking thrilled as schoolboys on an outing.

In Cadaques there is no beach worthy of mention. But there are friends and boats and we took both a few miles up the coast to the bay of Port Ligat. There the house where Dali had spent most of his life stood in an overgrown olive grove, closed to the outside world. Next to it was the villa belonging to Captain Moore, the man who was Dali's personal secretary. And next to this a mock Moorish castle painted sand red. It, too, was closed to the public, but it was rumoured to have once contained a load of Dali went diving for mussels and oysters in the bay Dali had of his religious works, the Christ of St John of the Cross. When we re-emerged, the naked outline of a woman was silhouetted against the sky, near to Dali's house; by her a man in red underpants was fishing with a bamboo stick. All around us the sea swayed with erotic motion, as if moved by some primaeval force. From Cadaques we went to Figueras and the Dali museum which holds the distinction of being the most popular museum in Spain after the

I realised then that Dali had achieved his ultimate tease: to make us part of the frame while exploiting our gullibility.

The six-dollar sunrise

6am. The Abu Simbel Hotel is not a luxury establishment. In high season you take what you can get when you fly into Aswan in the middle of the night without a reservation.

My bed sags. I cannot sit on the toilet without banging my knees into the sink. Outside my room a morose floor attendant sits in a ragged turban and long robe like a mummy propped in a chair. The lift is operated by touching two bare wires together. In the dimly-lit, sauce-stained dining room downstairs, ancient and cadaverous waiters stagger about like the cast from Night of the Living Dead. What can you expect for $6 a night?

What you do not expect is a room with a view worth a million dollars. I had never believed in the phrase "breathtaking" until I pulled back my curtains a minute ago. Sud-denly, the room was filled with scintillating light. The view was a vision of luminous clarity. In the delta far to the north. Mediterranean winter storms are battering Alexandria, and Cairo is wet and grey. But here on the Upper Nile the air is different. Bathed in early morning sunlight. Africa is startlingly close and beautiful.

Outside my window the Nile flows blue and silver-stippled through the desert, past the smooth granite outcrops and boulders of the First Cataract, past the mud-brick villages and date groves on Elephantine Island, and on round a wide, slow bend in the river. On the other side, yellow sand-dunes rise steeply out of the water. At their foot, above a fringe of feathery palms, sits the domed stone mausoleum of the Aga Khan; 500 ft higher, a row of dark entrances dug into sand and rock mark the Tombs of the Nobles. Below, on the riverside corniche, I can see life stirring. Horse-drawn caleches, all brass and polished leather, jingle down the mad toward the fivestar hotels. With a little hornhonking, the first cars and buses are warming up for another day's insane driving. Goats are browsing on grass and cigarette packets on a traffic island in the road. A cook emerges on the rear deck of a moored cruise boat and dumps a bucketful of papaya skins onto the bank

Already, advance units of the Corniche's army of touts and hawkers are on the march along its granite-tiled promenade. They are determined, irrepressible, skilled in the arts of the sidewalk ambuscade. "You want guide?" "You want felucca?" "You want to see my shop?" This is just the beginning of a long day's skirmish-

11.30am. All morning I have been tramping about Elephantine Island, the largest of the islands that sit in the Nile at Aswan. It is long and narrow, and houses not only the remains of a temple complex devoted to the ram-headed god Khnum, but two Nubian vil-

are in their 70s, they think, and have worked in the garden most of their lives. Mohammed is the chief gardener and Ouedah his assistant, although their polite manners, white turbans, grey moustaches and broken plastic shoes are so similar it is hard to tell who assists whom. Mohammed introduced himself with the gift of a fragrant

Mohammed approves, Ouedah does not I am more skinned peasants in bright blue djellabas - the long cotinterested in a drum-beating, ton robe of Egypt - swing mattocks in mud-walled vegehand-clapping Nubian wedding party that is skirting the island in a fetucco, the graceful miniatable fields. Camel car-Thomas Cook opened Upper avans of slaves and gold may Egypt to tourism a century have disappeared, but this "Hello Bicpen!" shout little remains one of of the noisiest, boys as they rush from bluemost colourful, odorous and and-yellow-painted mud-brick crowded market streets on the houses to greet visitors. "Hello continent. Bonbon!" scream little girls as

Here you can find glib young polyglot Egyptians in wraparound sun-glasses selling tourists anything from stuffed baby crocodiles to bottles of bogus Chanel perfume. But on the whole this remains the genuine thing, a Nubian market used by local people for everyday purchases.

Under shady awnings that overhang the street there are oranges, lemons and tangerines sitting in tall, geometrically perfect pyramids. There are shops that specialise solely in dates; in one I counted 18 varieties. There are piles of bright red peppers and shiny purple eggplants; stacked bas-

Egyptian statues carelessly kets of green lentils, yellow concealed in the undergrowth, tier upon tier; melon and pumpkin seeds for chewing and spitting; cages of fat pigeons and barrows of tripe; blocks of rock salt, rows of hookahs, bales of cloth.

The riotous profusion runs even to smells - odours of coffee, incense, drains, sweet tobacco, dried fish, sugar cane and a score of spices all blend-

Everything meets and mingles in this market - even races. The man sitting cross-legged on his vegetable barrow is an inky black colour. The ragamuffin on the shafts of a donkey cart is bricky red. The woman hawking brassware is a pale, eggshell brown. Aswan may no longer be the major trading cross-roads between Arab and black Africa that it once was, but its egacy lives in its genes.

7pm. I am taking my revenge on the shoddiness of the Abu Simbel and drinking a gin-and-tonic on the riverside terrace of the Old Cataract Hotel. It is quite possibly the most beautiful place in the world to watch the sun go down. Long after it has sunk below the horizon, feluccas continue to glide and swirl on the river below like swallows on a twilight hunt.

10.30pm. A cold wind is blowing in from the Libyan desert, and it is as chilly now as it was at dawn. But the people of Aswan, swathed in heavy turbans and thick cotton gowns, are as hardy as they are sociable. At the outdoor cafés on the square by the railway station, business is booming. Water pipes are bubbling, tea steams from glasses, and from every table comes endless chatter and the rattle of dominoes and dice.

I have eaten two stuffed pigeons, been beaten three times at backgammon, and am going to bed. There are no rooms free elsewhere, so it is back to saggy beds, dodgy lifts and zombie waiters. But I do not mind. With an Upper Nile sunrise only hours away and just outside the window, how could I?

Mexican mix that works

FTER the Second World War, 800 American GIs were sent to San Miguel de Allende, four hours north of Mexico City. Many of them married Mexicans, establishing the core of what has become the most successful mix of Mexicans and Americans in the country. The mix works because they genuinely like each other, whereas in other parts of Mexico Americans are often envied and resented.

The town has had its ups and downs. Built in 1542, San Miguel was a day's walk from the silver mines in Guanajuato. The countryside roundabout was fertile and had numerous hot springs, so many of the mine owners lived in San Miguel and built themselves fine houses.

To walk down a street is to gain little idea of the beauty of these houses. It is only when you pass through a door into gardens full of blue plumbago and bougainvilia and see lofty courtyards filled with hanging ferns that you glimpse something of the grandeur within.

Emperor Maximilian greeted the crowds from the balcony of the house where I was staying. The streets are cobbled and round every corner there are chuches with bells which chime in strange sequence: throughout the night but which are oddly silent during the day.

Much of the day-time noise

comes from the sprawling market in the centre of town. It is very much a working market. From the surrounding countryside, people bring their produce - tomatoes, radishes, carrots, potatoes, perhaps two or three avocadoes, a mass of gaudy gladioli, pinks, chrysanthemums. Cheap plastic toys jostle for place with imitation ewellry, leather shoes, embroilered cotton dresses.

There are many religious processions. The statue of the saint of the day is dressed in clothes and carried around the town by eight women, of all ages, dressed in black, who wear the label Virgen on their shoulders. When the statue returns to its church, it is greeted by Indian drums and Andean-sounding flutes, fireworks and firecrackers.

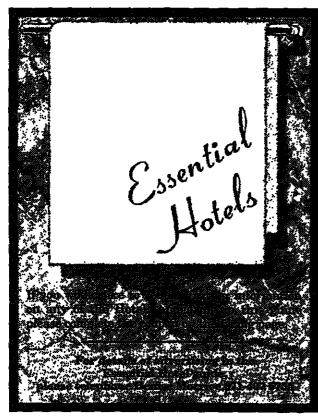

The mixture of Catholicism and Indian culture makes everything seem alive and vibrant. However, the real hub of the town is focussed around the zocalo, the Plaza Allende, which is shaded by bay trees. There is a small bandstand but mostly people come here to talk, to watch, and to court.

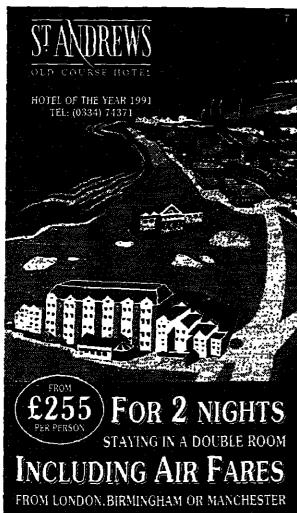

In 1938 a Peruvian set up an art school, Belias Artes, in the convent which had been built for Josefina de la Canal in 1775. Josefina was the daughter of a man made rich by silver. At the age of 17 she decided to become a nun, so her father built her a convent, part of which still houses the Concepcionistas, an enclosed order. San Miguel makes an extremely good base from which to visit other parts of the state of Guanajuanto. Ten miles away is the village of Atotoniko, which has a huge church. Adjoining it is a vast building where 4,000 penitents undertake eight-day retreats. Very few outsiders see this spooky place when the penitents are there (50 weeks of the year) no one is allowed in. Conversely; once the penitents have committed themselves. they are not allowed out.

in the dusk, bats swoop and stray dogs roam the huge, damp, dank concrete passages which are the sleeping quarters and which contain nothing but an iron bar for hanging clothes. Complete silence is required; reading is not allowed. Men and women come at separate times. There are two meals a day. Beans, coffee and tortillas are cooked in black cauldrons by volunteers. As a further enticement, selfflagellation is recommended.

been one of those cult stores whose influence was infinitely more important than its size. Started by David Krantz (who now is looking after his newest baby, the mail order clothing company Racing Green), from one shop in Golders Green in part of the Storehouse Group; it has 24 branches all over the UK and a niche in the hearts and minds of many a snappy man about town.

Its strength has been its commitment to understated, classic clothes of high quality with a distinctly English look navy wool blazers, crisp Oxford shirts, cotton chinos. According to Robert Jenkins, its new young managing director, Blazer, largely because of its quality image, has not been as seriously affected by the recession as some more prosaic lines. Nonetheless, he says: "I wouldn't have liked to have lived through the last two years without the backing of Given the brief by his masters "to make it gallop" he felt he had to do something. The first thing was to initiate some qualitative market research which revealed that the typical Blazer man reads the FT (wise Economist. He also prefers Virgin Atlantic Airways to any other, takes two holidays a year (one skiing in the winter, one long-haul), drives a Golf GTI or a BMW and is likely to live in Fulham, Hampstead or

It also revealed that as customers' spending power decreased, fashion had increasingly to compete with other things (like the skiing, the long-haul holiday and the cars), in particular with reasonably priced one-off design products, which were doing surprisingly well in an otherwise gloomy retailing scene.

It also emerged that 26 per cent of the adult population in Britain bought at least one example of British crafts during last year, and that the same number visited at least one crafts exhibition. From there Jenkins developed an idea of linking the Blazer shops with individual, distinc-

Having discovered that his customers disliked frequent sales ("it undermined their confidence in the product") he decided to generate interest and excitement in his shops by commissioning a piece of furniture from several distinguished designers. Each piece would feature prominently in one of the stores, and a brochure was produced showing each designer (almost all of whom were already Blazer customers) wearing some of the clothes.

The exhibition is shortly to finish, so anybody interested should hurry along to their nearest Blazer branch where every one of these pieces can be bought. Even if it has already been sold the shop can link designer and potential customer or client so other pieces in similar vein can be bought or commissioned.

In the meantime, the splendid brochure shows Designer Man looking very creative in a series of Blazer clothing, reaching out to creative directors, art directors, film directors, interior designers and showing that there is more Blazer than mere Yuppiedom. Malcolm Temple, a painter turned furniture maker, for instance, is shown wearing a pinstriped suit teamed with a T-shirt and grey flannels and a classic blazer with a two-but-toned woollen polo shirt customers and Robert Jenkins

There are only three villages, almost ham-lets: Francs, St Cibard and tiny

Until recently there was a fourth, Les Salles, which included the prominent Ch Belcier, owned by the Massif insurance company, but in 1989 Castillon secured the right to drop the word Bordeaux from its label, Les Salles joined it, and Bel-cier voluntarily followed it. appellation, Bordeaux Côtes de Francs, was granted in 1967, when it chose to retain Bordeaux on the label in the belief that, in the ever-growing world of wine, association with Bordeaux established a certain identity. Although similar to Côtes de Castillon wines, with the same clay-limestone soil and Merlot-Cabernet Franc-Cabernet Sauvignon vine composition, there is rivalry between the two.

Whereas the much larger Castil-lon is content to be included, by the Consell Interprofessionel in Bordeaux, as one of the Cotes group such as Bourg and Blaye - one class up on generic Bordeaux -Francs claims that it is remote from these bigger districts, and that its wines are different. (This is certainly true.) It says it is really part

Traditionally it was, with wines similar to St Emilion, as in adjoining Puissegin. In time, it hopes to

Nevertheless, the development of the Côtes – described by one vine-yard proprietor as "the last revolu-tion in Bordeaux" – has been unusual, a state of affairs mainly set down to the distinguished Bel-gian wine merchant family of Thienpont. The head of the family, Georges Thlenpont, had bought in 1924 the leading Pomerol estate of Vieux Ch Certan, still owned by the family. In 1946 his son, also Georges, bought a large mixed farm in St Cibard, and in 1980, on the clay-limestone plateau, he planted 30 ha of the common blend of 50 per cent Merlot, 30 per cent Cabernet-Franc and the rather large percentage of 20 per cent Cabernet-Sauvignon in the hitherto neglected vine-yard of Puygueraud, which is now run by his son, Francois. This was followed, in 1984 - by planting in the same village - 10 ha of La Claverie and, in Francs in 1988, 5 ha of Charmes-Godard - both of them in the hands of another son, Nicho-

Moreover, in 1985 Francois Thienpont persuaded two of his friends, Dominique Hébrard, son of the former director of Cheval-Blanc, and Hubert de Bouard, son of the owner of Angélus also in St Emilion, to buy for a modest sum the large, ancient semi-ruined Château de Francs and its ill looked-after vineyard, planting 30 ha of Merlot (60 per cent) and 20 per cent apiece of the two Cabernets. The cellars have been restored, but the boarded-up château awaits a buyer. Finally, the migration from St

Emilion was followed by Patrick Valette, whose father owns Pavie, to 11 ha of La Prade vineyard in St Cibard. So a good deal of viticul-tural experience has been injected into the tiny district. (It is only fair to add that excellent wine is also made elsewhere here; for example in Moulin-la-Pitié and Massau, while the co-op produces a superior, pal-matured Duc de Seignade brand)
Another speciality of the Cotes is an AC which includes white wines. sweet as well as dry, neither of which is allowed in the Côtes de Castillon nor, of course in the large St Emilion area. So far, only Francs and Charmes-Godard have produced a dry white wine, for the Sémillon and Muscadelle grapes. The 1990 was the first vintage produced in very small quantities: aromatic, oaky wines of considerable body and flavour, very much on the lines of the "new wave" dry white Bordeaux. The sweet whites, only to be expected in very fine years, will be awaited with considerable interest.

The red wines are deep in colour. often rich on the nose, and concentrated on the palate: real mouthfuls of wine. The leading vintages are '83, 85', '86, '88 and '89. When in bottle, the '90 may well be excep-tional. Puygueraud is what the French like to call the "locomotive" of the district. It's reputation began with the '85, although, surprisingly, its '83. (from only three-year-old vines) was remarkably successful. The vintage probably at its peak is

Of the wines I sampled on my recent visit, the '86 of Francs (its first proper vintage) had lots of body, and so did the '88, along with Moulin-la-Pitie and Puygueraud. The La Prade '89 had an elegant nose and long flavour, though the Francs, because of its prolific Merlot, was softer.

The '89 is now widely on offer there but, like the '88, is not to be opened for at least another two or three years, because they both are

On British lists, the Côtes de Francs are even rarer than the Côtes de Castillons; few Bordelais or British merchants visit them in any depth. But with the high-flyers of the Medoc, and St Emilion increasingly expensive, demand should rise for the relatively inexpensive, stylish Cotes de Francs wines – although with nearly half still sold in bulk to the Bordeaux trade, and thus losing its identity in blends, there is some way to go. Much will depend on the enterprising immigrant proprietors.

On lists now, Stokes Fine Wines. London, SW9 (tel:071-582-9265) offer Francs '88 at £84 a case; Tanners of Shrewsbury (0743-232400) have Lauriol '88 at £4.28 a bottle; Haynes, Hanson & Clark, London SW8 (071-736-7878) list La Prade '89 (£55.80 a case); and Lay & Wheeler of Colchester (0206-764446) offer La Prade '90 ex-cellars when bottled, at £43.92 a dozen – a duty-paid price of about £66 a dozen bottles.

That first meal in Ho Chi Minh City (formerly Saigon) at a kerbside restaurant with as many cats as patrons - was just one of many based around soup. A Coke or beer can increase the price of lunch almost six fold to about 60p.

Much of Vietnam's daily life takes place on the street. Vendors hawk rice squares wrapped in banana leaves, soya bean cakes, carved pineapple pieces and bread rolls. One of the joys of Vietnam is the abundance of seasonal fruits and vegetables. There are the usual - such as watermelon, mangoes, strawberries, oranges, avocados and arti-chokes – and the less familiar, jackfruit, a pendulous affair the size of a football containing. thick perfumed orange petals; and muop, a long pale green vegetable, the flavour of which reminded one diner of wet swimming towels left rolled up for several days.

Cookery Recipes to stir the pulses

Gone are the deadlyserious pulse and wholegrain menus that lay like lead on the stomach and depressed the spirit of those who did not worship at the altar of the health food reli-

New-wave vegetarlanism is concerned not with cant but with the pleasures of good eating without meat. Red meat that is: fish remains on the menu for many and game and poultry for some. The new style is generous of spirit, full of joie de vivre, rich in textures, bursting with fresh capable of lovely subtleties.

The most exciting new exponent is a young cook called Annie Bell, whose first book has just been published: A Feast of Flavours, subtitled The New Vegetarian Cuisine (Bantam £14.99). Bell is a talented and instinctive cook, no stickler for the confines of tradition but breaking new ground happily with her own menu structures. Her meals are designed as "a series of little courses that complement and mingle with each other" rather than what my husband calls the obligatory three-piece suite: first course, main course and pudding. The idea is appealing, but I

But most home cooks, surely, want to hang up their aprons when the doorbell rings and spend the evening with those gathered round the table. Perhaps I am just too old a dog to learn new tricks. Certainly, some of her menus made me salivate as I read them, and they include many triumphs. Her cooking style, and the way she combines ingredients, show a fine under-standing of, and respect for, the raw materials.

She seems fond of many of the ingredients I love: lemons, aubergines, fennel, spinach, globe artichokes, caramelised onions, pears, pine nuts, red peppers, basil and rocket. Like many who eschew meat, she displays a weakness for sweet things, particularly chocolate.

(serves 6) There are some lovely pastry recipes: phyllo tartlets filled with parsley purée and grilled courgettes; scallops and artichoke bottoms in puff pastry with a purée of roasted garlic; and a rhubarb tart that throws all pre-conceived notions of rhubarb tart out the window.

Some of the dishes that attract me most are beautifully simple: wilted spinach with hazelnut oil and pomegranates; wild rice and fennel salad; peaches baked on brioche with a sabayon sauce; and the two I quote below. Her recipe for stuffed peppers is far and away the easiest I know to prepare - and it is one of the best stuffed pepper dishes I have

Here is a vegetarian cook who is not shy of butter, cream or eggs. She does not once suggest using wholewheat pastry or brown rice. Indeed, her book is very nearly a pulse-free zone (Le Puy lentils are served with mussels, tapenade toast and quennelles of tomato mousse) and there is a notable absence of the miche-style clichés that pass as vegetarian options in some circles. This is happily hedonistic vegetarianism. The title is apt. Annie Bell has delivered a

That trickle has turned into a stream, with roughly 100 different single malt whiskies now on offer, breeding a new race of enthusiasts who go about collecting new releases with the same passion as chil-dren used to spot trains. good wine I should be happy to see more. Many distilleries remain closed as a result of rationalisations which took place in the industry a generation ago. This is particularly true of the whisky stills on the islands, which were too remote to have even a tourist industry to support their continuation. Scotland's smallest distillery, Edradour, near the old spa-town of Pitlochry, has known how to

itors who visit the Highlands every year, and now about half of its production is sold from the cellar door.

Edradour is owned by Campbell Distillers, now part of the Pernod-Ricard Group. Its blended whiskies include Clan Campbell and House of Lords. Only about 20 per cent of Edradour, however, is purloined for the blends, the rest is sold as a 10-year-old single malt. Only about 2,000 cases are made annually on the distillery's two small stills. Everything is small scale in the buildings which cluster on either side of the Edradour spring. Since 1966 all the whisky has been run off into casks formerly housing oloroso sherry. By 1996 this "sherrying" process will be complete, and the Edradour, like the more famous Macallan, will be a 100 per cent sherry-wood malt. Campbell Distillers' other malt, Aberlour, produces more than 50 times as much whisky as Edradour. Although it is only a stone's throw from the Spey it has little of Edradour's charm. The first licensed distillery on the site burnt down at the turn of the century and the new buildings are dour and functional. The only historical charm is provided by St Dun-over the process from the steeping of the grist or milled, malted barley to the transfor-mation of the sweet, porridgy wort into beery wash prior to distillation. The wash is dis-tilled twice, then run off into cask and left to mature.

"Mature in peace" is what I nearly wrote, but Kenny serenades the casks with his antique bagpipes; something perhaps more pleasant for Scotch whisky than it would be for most people living on the other side of the border. Kenny arrived in 1970, so all the Aberlour currently on the market was reared in this way. I am happy to say that he put down his pipes in order to put me through a tasting of Aberlours and Edradours at differ-ent stages of their development from the new-run spirit to the 1969. I have always found new whisky rather attractive with its smells of pears, raspberries and bananas. It is hard to tell that it is not fresh, fruit schnapps until you taste the cereal character on the palate.

About 10 years ago, malt distillers began to re-use Bourbon casks to house Scotch whisky. Now malts fall into two main styles: those which derive their mellowness from years in Kentucky oak and those which absorb a sweet, raisiny character from ageing in old oloroso casks from Jerez in Spain.

The straight, 10-year-old Aberlour has a strong nutty, buttery character with a bouquet of raisins and dried apricots which marks it out as a sherry-wood whisky. Edradour is rather sweet, with a taste of honey and walnuts; a real after-dinner whisky. More recently Aberlour has released two superb 21-year-old whiskies: a 1969 and a 1970. These are perfect illustrations of the

The '69 is all sherry-wood and smells like rich fruitcake with a hint of smokiness. More of a whisky-drinker's whisky is the '70, the first made by Kenny Fraser. This was housed in Kentucky casks, giving it a porridge-like smell recalling the wort. These are two whiskies which will make admirable additions to a collection.

His family - thanks to the combination of a fishing grandfather and a grandmother on the commercial side - monopolised the Morecambe Bay fish trade. Until the early 1950s Morecambe was an important easide location: weekend trains in the summer season disgorged 800 visitors every 15 minutes at Morecambe station. Twenty stone of shrimp is a good catch for the eight-hour voyage. Once on board, the shrimps are cleaned and cooked in boiling sea water. Later they are hand peeled by the fishermen and their wives in approved premises, then delivered to Baxter.

Kathleen and Doreen, with more than 35 years' experience between them, take over. In a small room, no bigger than a domestic kitchen, the shrimps and protect the contents. The process is swift: out of the sea and into the pot in a maximum of 36 hours. It is simple, too: there is only one ctentially important customer to produce potted shrimps to a slightly lower specification,

The shrimps are boiled on board in seawater, then hand-peeled ·

Bob Baxter refused. On a busy day Kathleen and Doreen fill 750 pots; in a good year, 150,000. In the past, the weather was the higgest obsta-cle - not merely storms, but changes on the sea bed occurring every eight years. In 1991 the shrimp catch was reduced

Baxter now feels that the obstacles are multiplying, and man-made. Like most professional food handlers he cares about hygiene and safety: the shrimps are regularly analysed by an independent laboratory, and his formica-topped tables were replaced by stainless steel long before any directives appeared. But he has no truck with the sentiment expressed by a government health offi-cial, that the main drive for quality should be fear of prose-

ties are a good product and a Last year, as recession was also affecting sales, two new obstacles materialised. First, the EC decided to classify the one-man 25st trawling boats as "factory ships." Although not yet passed into law, this directive could lead to the end of the immediate boiling of the shrimps in sea water, an important part of the traditional process. Instead, the small fishing vessels would be

cution. For Baxter, the prioribreak the contact between Baxter and his customers. The second stipulation means that he can no longer supply his retail or restaurant customers with fresh potted shrimps; they now have to make do with frozen shrimps. (There is, though, no significant difference in taste: at certain times of the year the shrimps are frozen to ensure a constant supply.)

Fortunately for all smallscale UK food producers, the ban on mail order business was lifted, allowing it to continue to the "end-user": the private customer. For Baxter this was critical: local trade now accounts for only 5 per cent of his entire production. In late 1991 he placed an advertisement in a national newspaper. offering ten 20z pots at £19.90 inclusive of packing and postage. £4,000 worth of new busiss was the result.

There has been speedy repeat business from grateful customers. If he can maintain momentum, Baxter plans a small modern unit to handle mail orders.

all seemed so easy. Carolyt Whitwell had a shop in Bristol ready to open. She had supplies of clothing ready to transport from India. She had never even dreamed of the existence of the multi-fibre arrangement (MFA).

The MFA governs world trade in textiles. In practical terms it means that if you want to export clothing from India you need "quota" approval from the Indian authori-

The origins of Carolyn's business lie in a twinning arrangement between the Bishopston district of Bristol and the south Indian village of K V Kuppam. The people of Bishopston asked those of K V Kuppam what they most wanted. The answer came back: jobs

An enterprise began, involving at first six tailors in India. K V Kuppam is in a cotton-growing area with a traditional village textile industry. Carolyn and her partner, Jaki Collard, supplied sample garments, and within weeks the first herself through a business course at Bristol University. She had no experience, but a lot of enthusiasm, and some luck. A £1,500 insurance payout after her home was burgled provided some working capital.

Then they heard about the quota. "We knew nothing about international trading," said Carolyn, "and we couldn't get our clothes out of India without quota."

Carolyn learnt that a quota was awarded on the basis of past export performance. "So how did new exporters get started?" Nobody knew - or nobody who knew was

In desperation, Carolyn rang everyone she could think of who might help. No one wanted to know. Finally a friendly response from clothing retailers Oasis Trading referred her to its Delhi agent. From the agent Carolyn learned of "sample quotas". You could export 25 garments every 10 days, as samples. Form two companies and you could export 50 items every and call them a suit: two garments Eventually that first day of trad-ing arrived. "I was intoxicated," she said. "Then we ran out of stock after three weeks." With 1,000 members of the Bishopston Link there was no problem finding customers or staff for the shop. But obtaining sufficient supplies was another matter. The Delhi agents were far from K V Kuppam in south India. And they had to be paid months in advance. In K V Kuppam, delays meant the village ran out of money to pay for cloth and the tailors. In Bristol, garments had arrived in the

At the end of the first year, all there was to show for the months of struggle was a £15,000 loss. "That was our worst point," said Carolyn. "But we could see why we had made a loss. The clothes had all arrived at the wrong time and we had too much stock unsold."

The next year they concentrated on improving quality. The village tailors were used to making gar-ments as fast as possible to maximise earnings. They had to be per-suaded they would be paid the same for making fewer but better items.

By the third year Bishopston Trading, propped up with a bank loan, a second mortgage and funds from Carolyn's grandfather, finally

Again, a friendly tip from a big company had come to their aid. The Delhi agent was too far from the village, but P&O responded to a call from Carolyn and put her in touch with its own shipping agent in nearby Madras. This modern, efficient, big-city agent was a world away from the primitive village industry, but it agreed to take on Carolyn's little business. Some staff knew nothing of village life, but in time the agents almost took the role of managers, providing the on-theground control that was so hard to supply from a distance. Last year the agents came to the rescue when the workforce, by now 70 tailors and 140 handloom weavers, threatened to strike. What had seemed from Bristol like a coming together of two communities albeit a rich one and a poor one, with a hefty dose of paternalism seemed different from the viewpoint of the Indian villager. Far from feeling humbly grateful to western benefactors who had created so many jobs, Carolyn's workforce was beginning to exert a little trade union muscle. Unknown to her, her workers had been organised by a communist activist, and were demanding huge pay rises.

Carolyn refused to pay, insisting that she was not an employer, simply a benevolent buyer. With mediation from the Madras agents, a 20 per cent rise was eventually agreed.

Today the business has a turnover of £250,000, with three shops. sales through the Oxfam catalogue, and other outlets.

Carolyn readily admits to breaking all the rules of business. She does not share the usual business motivation - making money for herself only recently she raised her own pay to £4 an hour. And profit is a secondary factor after fair wages and prices, and creating employment - although in the last full year she made £15,000.

The export quota rules remain a bugbear and a constraint on growth - and likely to remain so, with the Gatt talks on reforming world trade edging closer to failure.

Accounts in speedy detail of everything you have ever sold, your purchase involces contain the details of everything you have ever bought. Recently I looked at the new type of sales and purchase ledger packages which, when you enter an invoice, aim to cap-ture all that vital sales and purchase information in the greatest possible detail, enabling you to build up sales and purchase history data-

The new ledger packages allow you to store and display far more information for each invoice. A listing of all invoices on an account will give an entire history of everything you have sold to that customer, which before would have been impossible. To record sales and purchase invoices in this detail demands a lot of disk space. It is only with the advent of unlimited disk storage that this has become feasible. The potential s exciting, but as hundreds or thousands of records build up in the sales history and purchase history, the problem arises: how do you find your way around all this data?

Suppose, for example, you have 20,000 transaction records on your sales history. One thing you will want to do is to find, quickly, one particular record. This facility, sometimes called "serial number/batch tracking" is essential for companies who must be able to keep track of everything they have ever sold, such as computer companies, or drug manwacturers.

If you wanted to find out which customer purchased that Deluxe Spoon, serial number 123456, and when. It would be a long job to call up those 20,000 records one by one and try to find it yourself. The computer can do the job for you by means of a "string search". You simply ask it to search through the all the records, and find any record where the Description field contains the character string "123456". For a 20,000 record file this might take about 30 seconds. Apart from finding individlyse the information in the 0727-813447.

OUR sales invoices sales and purchase history. contain the details Anyone who has ever had experience of a large database on computer will know that the key to analysing it is to be able to sort and search by reference to codes. The more codes you have attached to each record, the better. The new ledger packages handle this neatly. When you first want to do business with Hotel XYZ, you must set up their account details in the sales ledger. It invites you to fill in not only their name and address but certain codes such as account code, area code, salesman code and so on. Similarly, when you set up a new product record for Deluxe Spoons, you fill in not only the description and price but also codes such as product number, and price category.

As each invoice line is entered on to the ledger, the computer automatically retrieves the codes associated with this customer and this product, and adds them to the newly created sales history record. So, without any effort on your part, all the records in your sales history are automatically coded by salesman, area. price category and so on, ready for you to make your enquiries. You simply tell the computer: "Find me all the spoon sales made to anyone in the hotel industry in the north-west of England in the first six months of 1992." Obediently it zips through 20,000 records and comes up with the six that meet these criteria. All in 10 seconds flat.

There are a only a few of these new ledgers on the market, most introduced during the last 12 months. In my last column I mentioned Business Manager, a budget range package from Pegasus, a bargain at £299. This creates the sales and purchase histories but does not transfer the codes from the customer and product records. One of the new packages which does code the history records is Sequel, a mid-range package developed by the exboss of Pegasus.

Sequel can be ordered by telephone: 08015-466.

WEEKEND FT SPECIAL REPORT - LANGUAGE COURSES

Sir Peter Parker presents his own 1992 Award for Spoken Japanese to Peter Woodland, of Alps Electric UK

Japan is changing: from "difficult" market to that of important trading opportunity. Japan's former protec-tionism has shifted to an equally vigorous internationalism, and there is increasing scope for more complex commercial relationships, strategic partnerships and technological exchange.

In the spring of 1991, the UK's Department of Trade and Industry, together with a committee of lea ing industrialists, launched Priority Japan, a consciousness-raising exercise with specific economic goals: to assist an increase to £5bn in annual sales to Japan in three years, and to narrow the balance of trade.

As commercial links between Britain and Japan increase, so does the demand for Japanese language as a working tool. Learning Japa-nese indicates a serious commitment to doing business in that

Many of the most imaginative business language training initia-tives in the UK are coming from the public sector. A DTI pump-priming fund of £1.6m over four years, to be matched by private funding, was established in 1989, to support business-oriented intensive language courses which include a substantial period of study in Japan. (See box) The courses are intended for high flyers; graduates and/or people with several years' business experience. The University of London's School of Oriental and African Studies (SOAS) offers a one-year programme combining intensive language study with a survey of the contemporary Japanese economy. Business in Practice' brings partici-

people from sectors such as pharmacenticals, energy, electronics and finance, who are working at a senior level in companies doing business with Japan. The fourth component of the course is a threemonth work placement in Japan, giving practical insight into how business functions.

The Scottish Centre for Japanese Studies at Stirling University runs a similarly intensive year-long pro-gramme, including three months' study at the Graduate School of Policy Science at Saitama University, with a further optional three months' work placement in Japan.

ticipants are expected to behave in a Japanese way from the word go, and the lectors are very strict about that," explains Wendy Moor, the project co-ordinator. "It is important preparation for when they go to Japan and work there. The protocol and etiquette of Japanese business life are absolutely vital. You can't really separate culture and

The courses are taxing. The demands, not only of an unfamiliar language, but also of an unfamiliar discipline, place strain on the students. "The most intelligent, articulate, open-minded person will still have problems," admits Wendy vidual study. The structure of Japanese is simpler than many European languages, and it is not necessary to be skilled in script in the early stages in order to speak and understand. Most native English speakers find Japanese easier to pronounce than, say, French.

A more serious difficulty is to master the appropriate "register", or level of formality, with which to address and respond to interlocutors. The SOAS course emphasises the relationship between Japanese language and culture. "In class, par-

Moor. "Everybody's pulled through so far, but it's been tough." Course providers in both the public and private sectors agree that between nine months and a year of intensive study is required to reach a level at which one can expect to converse in most business and social situations. This inevitably poses problems for companies. Many staff who need to learn Japanese will be senior personnel, and not readily spared for long periods. But companies with a serious "Japan strategy" are making the commitment. Cable & Wireless, for example, is planning to train one employee per year on the SOAS programme for the next ten years, spearheading a continuing Japan the race.'

development programme, and building the training into the career structure of suitable personnel. New corporate sponsors for the SOAS course starting this month include the Oracle Corporation, and Sotheby's. The insight which staff gain through knowledge of the language is worth the investment according to Dr Clive Morton of the engineering company Komatsu UK. "The logic of it is that they learn the Japanese approaches." he says. "They can understand where Japanese engineers are coming from, in particular in terms of their design activity and production improve-

But while government and industrial leaders are ringing in their exhortations, many at grass roots level are less than convinced they need to act. "We've been quite disappointed at the reaction of many companies," says Wendy Moor. Some simply don't have any idea of what it is to learn Japanese at business level. They still think you can learn by having once-a-week evening classes.

There is no objective evidence on whether this reluctance is recession-led, or due to a lack of corporate imagination. But Wendy Moor feels that more must be done to change their minds. "I think it's a question of educating companies into what we're trying to do," she says. "They should have a Japanese approach in how they train their staff - in a nutshell, long term. The Japanese think ten, 20 years ahead. And in Britain especially, that's not how we think at all. That's why we're getting behind. We're losing

Intensive courses, while arguably the most effective way to learn a foreign language, are also the most expensive - particularly if the skill acquired in the heat of secondment to the Bonn office is lost within months of a return to the UK.

Knowledge of a foreign language, like any skill acquired through training, will atrophy unless put into practice and sustained. Yet few British companies provide a culture in which staff are encouraged to maintain their hard-won competence. Positive corporate initiatives are needed to ensure that language skills are maintained at an operational level:

■ Conduct a language audit. It is essential to know who can do what. This may seem obvious, but companies often reveal a surprising ignorance of their current language resources. One participant in the IMS study discovered that the employee with the highest degree of language competence was the Polish gardener.

■ Design programmes: There is a confusing variety of material and methodology available, from simple "get-by" texts and cassettes to sophisticated interactive video courses. Different learners have different needs, and no-one benefits from a random selection. A competent training provider will assist in the design of programmes to meet specific objectives and circum-

■ Provide motivation: Few staff will take the trouble to maintain a skill for which there is no perceived need. Use of the target language - on occasional overseas trips, for example, or in monitoring the foreign media - should be built into the work structure. The rotten truth behind the five-ring circus

By Michael Thompson-Noel

HERE ARE two ways of looking at the Olympic Games - or 20, or 200. But let us stick to two, lest madness overtakes

The first way is to accept the propaganda peddled by the International Olympic Committee (IOC) in Lausanne and imagine, just for a moment, that the Olympics really are about youth, sport, peace, brotherbood and moral uplift. The IOC -90-odd members drawn randomly from 75 countries - are the people who actually own the Olympics. Their president and pontiff, Spain's Juan Antonio Samaranch, is the undisputed king of world sport. In Samaranch's view, the Olympics are the world's "most important contemporary social movement", and his beloved IOC "the world's leading authority on competitive

The second way to view the Olympics is the one that has gained ground since the tawdry and cutprice Games of 1984, in Los Angeles, which, to most folks' surprise, were run at a profit. According to this viewpoint, the Olympics are hopelessly bloated and cynical. They have been besmirched by drugs, corrupted by commercialism, over-run by greed and hi-jacked by a secretive and powerful cabal, led by Samaranch, which is known as The

Between them, members of The Club run world sport. The Club comprises Samaranch and his IOC members, plus the presidents of the international federations that control the 25 Olympic sports, pre-eminently Primo Nebiolo of athletics, the key Olympic sport, and Dr João Havelange of soccer, the world's most popular sport.

In the view of many, the Olympic Games are now a great and raging beast virtually out of control. In the view of some, the Games' most insidious rôle is to serve as marketing vehicle for some of the pagan gods of international commerce -Coca-Cola, Kodak, Brother, National Panasonic Ricoh Philips, Time. Mars, Bausch & Lomb, Visa, what have you. In the view of a few, the stench of commercialism that overhangs the Games is so strong that Samaranch and his IOC must be lanced, like a boil on the face of sport, if the Olympic movement is to survive and renew itself.

T GOES without saying that the first day of a new cricket season is played in cold, wet tional hostility of the elements excelled itself, to the point of hailstorms and gale-force winds last week on the few first-class grounds where play was possible at all. The handful of fans who turned out in the hope of seeing some cricket and the restless, track-suited cricketers hoping to oblige them sat in the pavilions agreeing that this year must be better than last.

Essex, of course, would be happy for this year to be the same as last year. The Britannic Assurance Championship was fiercely contested and Essex's confidence was as important as their range of talent through all areas of the game, holding them secure against strong pressure from Warwickshire and latterly from the ever unpredictable Derbyshire, who reached top form

The parlousness and precariousness of the Olympics under Samaranch are about to receive cruel exposure in a book, The Lords Of The Rings, by Vyv Simson and Andrew Jennings of Granada TV's World In Action team, which Simon & Schuster is publishing, in 11 lan-

"Traditionally", it says, "Olympic year sees a torrent of glossy books, articles and TV films about the beauty and purity of the Olympic ideal. In passing, they refer to the Lausanne-based International Olympic Committee and its benign president, Juan Antonio Samaranch. " How, under Samaranch, the IOC has turned from a non-commercial organisation led by worthy part-timers who defended the ethics of amateur sport into a professional, full-time business enterprise. "R How $20m of sponsors' money has ended up in an off-shore bank account controlled by just one man. "R How a leading member of Kuwait's royal family bribed sports officials to keep Israel out of world sport while the Olympic leadership turned a blind eye.

"How the Olympic leadership has spoken out against doping but done little - and how it has covered up the failure of its antidrug measures. Drug scandals have been suppressed in order not to frighten off the sponsors."

So much for Simon & Schuster. What about the book? The most useful task the authors have performed is to have gathered all the Olympic dirt they could find and stack it in one great pile, where it is accessible

They are good on Samaranch, ast-winding us forward to the opening ceremony of the Barcelona Games this summer as the IOC president steps forward to invite King Juan Carlos to declare open the Games of the 25th Olympiad.

"Watch the president's right arm", they say, "is it stirring, is it twitching, is it taking on a life of its own, compelled by some visceral force to rise to an angle of 45 degrees from his shoulder? . . . (Samaranch) rose to become a fascist parliamentarian, a fascist member of the Barcelona city council, fascist president of the Catalan regional council and, for a while, fascist sports minister. In his own words, maranch was '100 per cent Fran-

Simson and Jennings are good on the machinations of The Club and the IOC.

They are good on Dassler of Adidas, and how he developed The Club. In the view of Patrick Nally, Dassler's former business partner and right-hand man: "Horst became the puppet-master of the sporting world, pulling the strings to create massive changes, the pinnacle of which is his legacy of control of the modern Olympic Games. Horst got a tremendous buzz from controlling and manipulating. They are good on the Eastern bloc and its rump of discredited 10C members who still have power and

They are good on the backstage dramas at the Seoul Olympics in 1988, and how the Seoul Games were "conceived from a desire by a military junta to obscure their brutal image and to find new markets for their dynamic economy.

They are good on drugs. Good on cheating. Good on scandal. And good on the racketeering that underpins the selection of cities to stage the Games - the gifts and free-loading, and the escalating sums spent by candidate cities to climb aboard the wagon. The authors of The Lords Of The Rings are even good in many of their conclusions, and especially good when indicting Samaranch and Nebiolo. "There seems to be little philosophical difference in their approach to stage-managing our world of sport", the authors state. "They have hoisted themselves above their fellow officials to levels of absolute power previously unknown in the democratic world of sport. All that divides them is who should wield absolute control. "They come together in this Olympic year in Barcelona at what may be the turning point for the sport. Many people outside the complacent membership of The Club feel that too much has been conceded to the demands of the media and the multi-nationals. The spectators and the participants have never been consulted about 'com-munication tools' and 'exclusive categories' of product merchandis-ing. The TV viewers around the world increasingly believe that many of the stars are junkies, puffed up into chemical champions. In the scramble for more money, more perks, more self-indulgence, more TV viewing hours and more duhious world records the fundamental rights and concerns of the worldwide, silent majority outside The

But there are various defects in

the arguments advanced by those who claim to be sickened by the Olympics in their modern, corporatist guise - one of which is the inability to juggle with opposites and contradictions.

For a start, almost no critic of the Olympics seems capable of wrestling with the inevitability of money, drugs and commercialism. Sport was always bound to grow into a billion-dollar business. Yet most of the time, secure in their naivety (or the pose of naivety - a standard sportswriters' trick), crit-ics of the Olympics speak as though television could be uninvented, sponsorship could be uninvented. Coca-Cola could be uninvented. cheating could be uninvented, steroids could be uninvented, professionalism could be uninvented - as though all the world, and all of sport could have been kept pristine and savoury and goodie goodie, free

I have attended four summer Olympics, Mexico, Montreal, Los Angeles, Seoul. I will not be going again, not because the Olympics remotely offend me but because there are other things to write about, other fish to fry. Certainly the Olympics have grown big and cumbersome. Certainly they have become part of the global marketing-media-entertainment complex. Certainly they are a magnet for those who want to sell sticky beverages or copiers or con-tact lenses. Certainly some competi-tors pop pills and shoot up in a sad and desperate lunge for records, medals, millions. But the Olympics are still about sport, still about friendship, still about bridge building. They still do good, even while doing had. Forget about the silly ideals with which the Olympics are alleged to be concerned, the namby-pambyism of Baron Pierre de Coubertin, who revived the Olympics a century ago amateurism, valour, the importance of taking part, all that stuff and baggage. They are nothing of the sort. The Olympics are about winning. It is as simple, and as complex, as that. in the meantime, however, it looks increasingly the case that the IOC in Lausanne has slipped as far down the slope as it ought to think of venturing. The IOC needs fresh leadership, a determined change of direction. It is time to purge the pontiff.

 The Lords Of The Rings, Simon & Schuster, £14.99.

time that bore full fruit. The sad departure of Parker to Durham, when asked by Sussex's committee to give up the captaincy after four unsuccessful seasons in office and 17 happy and successful seasons at the club, made way for Alan Wells, "Bomber" of Newhaven and brother of Colin Wells, another "Bomber" of Newhaven, to become only the fourth Sussex captain since World War II born in Sussex. Newhaven in fact.

He is a man with a proud sense of county identity and if he can pass that on to the team and lead it happily, it might do well. For some time it has had to be a sharp fielding side, to keep enemy batsmen's excesses within limits, and it even boasts that most welcome of rarities: a young leg-spinner, Ian Salis-England "A" tour to the Caribbean. I look forward to watching him howl this summer.

Cricket/Teresa McLean

in dazzling style, too late. Essex have lost none of that confidence, and welcome Mark Waugh back from Australian national batting service to his county batting slot, profitably occupied last year by Salim Malik. But they are an odd team, Essex, with an unpredictable element about them, which led them into disaster in the one-day games while they were doing so well in the county championship.

It was quite an achievement to get themselves all out to Lancashire for 61 last Tuesday in the Benson and Hedges Cup. But that is what Essex are like. If they fail, they fail pathetically. If they do well, they do eight Lancashiremen Neil Foster removed at Manchester for 99 runs

One of Essex's most impressive features was good captaincy, by Graham Gooch and by Foster when Gooch was on Test duty. Foster showed enterprise and both were good ambassadors for age and experience in a game increasingly dominated by concern for youth and

The newcomers, Durham, are keenly recruiting young players. They boast a fair number of local youths already, tempered with the battle-wisdom of outsiders Wayne Larkins, Paul Parker and Ian Botham, along with their overseas

Jones began the season in bellig-erent form on Easter Sunday, his 114 dominating the day's play as Durham's 246 for 4 proved just enough to open the Sunday League with a win over Lancashire. The main force behind Jones's batting is its aggression and David Graveney will have his work cut out keeping that focussed on the enemy without. Though Durham bring with them a breath of fresh air, they also bring a lot more travelling, one of the most unpopular aspects of mod-that they started hiring a coach to take them to all their fixtures, so they could rest and talk on the way. Last season Glamorgan, not to be outdone, chartered an aeroplane to fly to one of their home games. This season's championship, grossly over-punctuated by one-day games, promises to be tight. Lancashire are keeping Neil Fairbrother as captain. His leadership will have to pull the team together for they are a temperamental lot. They were too inconsistent to do themselves justice last year. With Mike Atherton injured, they missed his spin bowling as well as his batting.

ing out entrenched Test batsmen and it was good to see him loosen-ing his arm at Chelmsford last week with his spinners and drifters. A generation earlier. I remember the cavalier Bob Barber and dogged Ken Barrington breaking up part-nerships when brought on to bowl for short stretches.

After two years at the bottom, Sussex rocketed to 11th last year and if I had to pick an outsider to do well in the championship this year, it would be Sussex. I respect their policy of recruiting and training young home grown players. It is for motorists who drive cars unfit to be on the road when a proposal by the Department of Transport comes into effect later this year.

At the moment, so long as a car three or more years old passes its annual inspection (the MoT test), it can be taxed, insured and driven for another 12 months.

What if it deteriorates and becomes unsafe during that period? In theory it should be repaired. In practice, many old cars in poor shape continue to be driven while they remain driveable. The police will prosecute if the car is involved in an accident or if the driver is stopped for a traffic offence and they find it has, say, illegally worn tyres or bad brakes.

But, rightly or wrongly, many owners of decrepit old cars think a current MoT certificate is a permit to keep on driving them until the next MoT inspection falls due. If they break down, they call one of the long-suffering rescue services – the subscription is seen as a financially attractive alternative to having the car properly maintained.

commercial vehicles. If one of its examiners at a roadside checkpoint finds a lorry in bad enough condition to be a danger to other road users, the driver is handed a prohibition notice. That means it has to be repaired on the spot or towed away by a recovery vehicle. Now the department proposes to treat cars and lorries alike. An old banger held to be dangerous will be banned immediately and have to be taken to a repair garage on a trailer. In less serious cases, the owner will be allowed to drive it to a garage. The prohibition notice stays in force until the car has been made roadworthy, given an MoT test and the owner has taken the certificate to a police station. The proposal is going through the usual consultative process on how it can be implemented. When it becomes law on July 1, it will help road safety. As a spin-off, roadside spot checks should catch a lot of irresponsible motorists who reckon the rules about taxing and insuring cars only apply to other people.

plicably dropped a big load carrier from its range, a Granada/Scorpio estate car has made a welcome appearance. It is a handsome car, spacious enough to pass the acid test of a really big estate; you can put a single bed inside it. It will look just as much at home at a Range Rover and Shogun infested three-day event or point-to-point as in the managing director's reserved park-There are versions with 2-litre, 4-cylinder, 120 horsepower or 2.9-litre. V6 145 horsepower engines, both with catalytic converters. They are priced only marginally higher than their 4-door saloon or 5-door hatchback equivalents.

The spread is from £18,413 for a 2.0-litre Granada LX manual estate to £21,760 for a V6 2.9-litre Scorpio.

This flagship of Ford's estate cars is trimmed in leather and has automatic transmission, air conditioning and self-levelling rear suspen-sion as standard. All Granada/ Scorpio models come with ABS brakes. The V6 Scorpio I drove in Scotland earlier this month is far cheaper than any rival equipped to the same standard. But, price apart, Ford's new bulk carrier is an exceptionally attractive car.

It rides with shock absorbent supdeness on its redesigned suspension whether running light or well laden. The steering wheel is small and power assistance is now speed

On winding roads the Scorpio has a much smaller car's nimbleness; on motorways it loafs along in that state of relaxed near silence peculiar to big, long-legged cars. The overall gearing gives close to

URING ten roller-coaster years, the London Dock-lands has been remoulded into one of the most exhilarating, bewildering and exasperating landscapes in Britain.

For the purists, hype gave way to hostility long ago. "London's Dock-lands contains one of the worst collections of late 20th century building to be seen anywhere in the world," said the Architecture Design and Technology Press. "The triumph of commer-cial expediency over civic values," concluded the Prince of Wales.

But anybody tired of the sullen ranks of suburban terraces elsewhere in London could be swayed by the Dockland's proximity to the heart of the capital, its energy and the appeal of being a pioneer in an area where urban history is still being made.

A surreal "city of the 21st century" has been superimposed on an area that still has Dickensian streets, 18th century churches and faint echoes of its raffish maritime past.

The fit is not wholly successful: the toy-like light railway that glides by the rooftops is notoriously unreliable; the flimsy balconies and steeply pitched roofs of new developments resemble those of dolls' houses; and the towering Canary Wharf looks like a fairy-tale castle deposited in the

The most popular developments in the Docklands are those that successfully combine the old and the new. The dream of most would be buyers in the Docklands is a converted warehouse complete with mellow brown brick, beams, huge rooms, high ceilings and views of the Thames.

A three-bedroom flat with these attributes in New Crane Wharf in Wapping would cost £325,000. Flats in Butlers Wharf, a scheme originally devised by Sir Terence Conran, a short walk from the City, are more expensive. A three bedroom flat with a magnificent view on to Tower Bridge costs £450,000. (Savills are the agent for both these developments.)

Not all warehouse conversions live up to the fantasy image, though Some have insufficient light, no balconies and do not face the river. The position of the windows means that even the best river views are often obscured when sitting.

Newly-built developments can be as popular, and expensive, as converted warehouses. Knight Frank & Rutley is marketing two bedroom flats in the St Hilda's development overlooking the river in Wapping High Street for

sider the disadvantages of moving to an area that has undergone such a dramatic upheaval. As well as some friction between long-standing inhabitants and wealthy newcomers, there are reminders that the new developments have been grafted on to an area noted for dereliction and poverty.

For instance, some flats in the ziggurat built by Regalian at Free Trade Wharf, which cost up to £265,000 for two-bedrooms) offer a breathtaking view of the river at its steepest point in the bend at the front, but a view of run-down housing over the bustling four-lane highway to the back.

The practical problems that have dogged Dockland pioneers are starting to ease. More shops are slowly arriving, most notably a Safeway supermarket opening later this year in Wapping. The traffic problems will be greatly improved when the current batch of extensive roadworks

Indeed, many Docklands dwellers say the area's attraction is a practical one. Compared to the travails of commuting from the country, a short drive into the City has great appeal for bankers and brokers. British Rail has made more sales for us than any-

is now the time to buy? After a market has to grapple with the difficult few years, agents have a diverse character of different parts of spring in their step. "For three months before the election, people were holding back," says Sarah Shelley of Knight Frank & Rutley. Since the election, she has been innundated with enquiries, she says.

"I firmly believe that now we have a Tory government we have hit the bottom," says Russell Taylor of Savills. He predicts that prices will stay level for the next 12 months.

Prices have fallen 30-40 per cent from their peak, according to Taylor. Even now, however, valuers working for building societies maintain that buildings are often overpriced. Some developers are prepared to offer large discounts for rapid sales. But others are determined not to be pushed into offering firesale prices. The receivers who manage Butlers Wharf are taking a long term view, preferring to let flats rather than sell them at bargain prices.

Anyone buying a property in the hope of making a rapid capital gain should also consider the possibility that the buildings bought by people hoping for a speculative gain may be released as the market recovers. Any assessment of the state of the ther evidence that the establishment of the Docklands as a thriving commercial centre will take longer than was expected in the heady days of the property boom. That suggests that people buying property in the hope of a speculative gain may have to wait

Docklands market if they like the area's commercial prospects have Another, related problem is the future of the extension of the Jubilee area's character and its proximity to the City. Anyone less sure could try it line, which is to link Canary Wharf out by making use of the area's wellestablished letting market.

Japan fails to face its shame

sians had a saying: "The trouble with Stalin and his Soviet Union have gone, perhaps the phrase should be bequeathed Shim Mi Ja's visit to Tokyo last month was a traumatic experience – for her, and for those who heard her testimony. Now 70 and living just outside Seoul, she was one of between 80,000 and 200,000 young Korean women forced to be prostitutes for the Japanese imperial army in the 1930s and 40s. Speaking in Japan's parliament building, she told Japanese women (many of whose fathers or grandfathers were in the army) of how she was forced to serve in a nfort station" - or military brothel in Fukuoka, southern Japan.

was asked to make a Japanese cherry blossom; instead, she made a Korean flower. It was seen by the Japanese military police. She was taken away, raped, tortured she still has the scars on her back and beneath her fingernails - and sent to Japan. "We dealt with 20 or 30 men a day," she said. "But, when truckloads of troops stormed in from the front, then you'd have 40 or 50 men each. I was a young girl dealing with 40 or 50 men in one day can you imagine that? On weekends, there would be long queues in the yard outside. It was a mechanical job; you couldn't get un or wash. Just one man after another,

Faced with the testimony of Shim Mi Ja and that of a growing number of other former "comfort women." prodded by Christian and women's groups to speak out for the first time in almost 50 years the Japanese government launched an official investigation. It claimed, however, that the comfort stations were run privately and that it had no legal or moral responsibility. That argument was disproved spectacularly in January when Yoshiaki Yoshimi, a professor of history at Chuo university, spent eight hours in the Defence Academy library in Tokyo. He found six documents. which showed that the army and the government both were involved in setting up comfort stations for soldiers on the Chinese front late in the 1930s.

Two of the documents record an order less relucta-from the commander in chief of the North tary road."

units to set up brothels as quickly as posthe past is that you never know what sible because rape by Japanese soldiers you'll find in it." Now that both was making it difficult to control the local population. Other documents talk of procedures for checking the women for venereal disease, and fears that contaminated soldiers returning home would spread VD.

A few days after Yoshim's documents were published, foreign minister Michio Watanabe said he "could not help but admit" that the imperial army was involved. Prime minister Klichi Miyazawa, about to start a state visit to Seoul when the story broke, spent much of his time there apologising. But the government has yet to provide any explanation of why its official investigation failed to uncover doc-uments which Yoshimi found within hours. Yoshimi says: "Some of them are hard to find, but most are catalogued and can be found easily. There is no way Japa-nese historians wouldn't know about them. They didn't want to investigate it." The issue of the comfort women has brought to the forefront, painfully, the way in which the Japanese authorities have resisted coming to terms with their colonisation of Asia in the first half of this century. In Germany, the fall of Hitler was followed by attempts to teach the younger generation the lessons of history, and to compensate victims of the Nazis. In Japan, there has been silence. Allied tribunals tried many individual soldiers for atrocities after the war, but the Japanese government has not pursued cases since.

Occasionally, the resentment of Japan's neighbours has surfaced in public. Ten years ago, there was a row with China and South Korea over the history textbooks used in Japanese schools. These either fail to mention the atrocities committed by the imperial army in Asia, or treat them in the most cursory way. The books all are vetted by Japan's education ministry. Angry protests by the South Korean government in 1990 elicited an apology from the new emperor, Akihito; he referred to the "unfortunate past between our two countries and for which my country was responsible." His father, Hirohito. had simply regretted "the unfortunate past." The addition of the seven extra past." words was thought by Japan to be an enormous concession.

The reluctance of the Tokyo government to acknowledge the past has left resentment and distrust among most of the occupied countries. Lee Knan Yew, Singapore's former prime minister, declared: "If they are not willing to confront the past and educate their children on what happened. instead of sloughing it off as an 'advance into south-east Asia,' it means that a younger generation of Japanese would be less reluctant, if pushed, to take the mili-Hajime Funada, an MP of the ruling Liberal Democratic party who heads a group studying reform of Japan's post-war (and pacifist) constitution, adds: "We can't carry on like this. It's creating too many problems we will have to face sooner or later." He fears that, without a rethink, "Japan will end up as a special case, left out of world concerns." The anxieties of other Asian countries are likely to become increasingly prominent as Tokyo struggles to find a political role to match its status as the world's second-largest economy. Adding largely to the problems is the continuing debate over whether Japan should have a military role outside its borders - something banned at present by the constitution. In the wake of the Gulf war, the government has been trying - so far, unsuccessfully - to pass a bill allowing the military to take part in United Nations' peace-keeping operations. This is unlikely to banish the deep-seated fear of Japan's neighbours about its possible re-militarisation, or a related concern that the institutions of democracy there may not be strong enough to enable Japan to behave - as Funada would wish - in a "normal" way. As its power grows, coming to terms with the past is becoming more necessary in order to come to terms with the future.

The press in Europe British papers: the best and the worst

COLLEAGUE said the other day: "I suppose you are an expert now."
"An expert on what?"

"On European papers. You've been writing about them for over a year — you must have read hundreds."

It turns out to be 37; at least, that is the number of titles which have appeared in London. They have come from a dozen countries, but there has been nothing from most of Scandinavia, Portugal, Greece, Bulgaria and Romania, so my expertise is a little sketchy. And not all the 37 have been "read," either.

Still, a year and a bit of this column has certainly taught me a thing or two. For one thing, when it comes to newspapers, Britain is astonishingly rich compared with the standards of the rest of Europe. It is not just that the British read more of them than anybody else; their papers have resources that others can only envy (and regret the manner in which, sometimes, these resources are used!) The big-gest French daily, L'Ouest Republicain, sells only about 1m, and no foreigner has ever heard of it. It seems to be published in Rennes (which is a bit like publishing The Sun in Market Harborough) and has a dozen different editions, each replete with incal fatstock prices.

In Spain, about one in eight of the population reads a paper. In Germany, most read the tiny local dailies which lay down the law for communities of 50,000 or so. At one time, Russian papers enjoyed vast power and influence; now, the former Communist Party mouthpiece Praoda is reduced to three appearances a week and can hardly afford that.

Each paper is unique, though. If you want to be well-informed on every issue under the sun (and elsewhere, for that matter), the Neue Zürcher Zeitung is good value. It might not provide the news of the day that interests you - or anything that interests you at all - but by the end of a month's reading you will have caught up with everything.

The papers I like, however, are those which are often reviled in their own countries. Die Welt has been loathed by liberals and the left in Germany because it is the flagship of the right-wing Springer press, but it is a good read.

This might be a purely subjective judgment; Welt looks and feels like a British paper - which it was when it started life under the occupation authorities. It seems, however, to do something quite alien to much of the German press: it produces well-written, concise articles which the readers find interesting. That, in the Frankfurter Allgemeine, would not be as bad as making a joke, but it would seem like lese majesty.

The French papers always seem a bit of a mess, even though Liberation, neatly, has pages the same size as its articles. But the result is that I can never find my way around Libé and a certain monotony sets

The front page of France-Soir is so awful that it is good. There are always about 18 stories, all continued on page four or 16. The other day, the strapline over the head line ran: "Tell me what you are afraid of and I'll tell you where you live." The headline: "The crime man of France."

But then, British papers are a mess to foreigners. Patrick de Jacquelot, of Les Echos, once asked me why the Financial Times would have a story about Robert Maxwell as its lead, a backgrounder on page three, an editorial 13 pages later, a eature opposite and, finally, a commen tary by Lex or someone at the back. In a French or Italian paper, the whole lot would have been on a single page. One daily which has impressed me is El Pais, again disdained by Spanish intellectuals. It is a bit like its French sister. Liberation, in pagination and layout, but it contains more interesting material and really does cover the ground. The nearest British parallel is the Guardian

Pais, though, has one feature that would cause a riot in Hampstead, not to mention uproar in every teachers' common room and social services office in Britain if the Guardian tried such a thing. Each day, the classified advertisements carry two or three columns of what are known in the trade as "hooker ads."

Prostitutes of both sexes give a concise account of their wares, delivery points, and a phone number. The Germans get near this in their weekend editions, but the Spanish are still reacting against the suffocation of the Franco years.

The Italians seem to react against nothing. Their papers have a world-weary feel, produced by people who know that nothing can surprise their readers. In an attempt to excite the jaded palates of its readers, La Reppublica will add a desperate twist to stories which are amazing in their own right, but it never comes off.

Of course, it could be just be what you know best, but I still prefer British papers. On holiday abroad, there is no choice between Le Dauphine Libere and a day-old Daily Telegraph. The "quality" press in the UK is unrivalled.

On the other hand, as a Spanish friend once remarked to me: "The best and the worst of Europe are to be found in

A garden to visit

A Sussex woodland paradise

EONARDSLEE is one of the most beautiful woodland gardens in England. It was laid out by Sir Edmund Loder after he bought the estate in 1889 and has been continued by his heirs, right down to Robin Loder who took over in Decem-

The garden is at Lower Beeding, near Horsham in West Sussex, and covers 200 acres of a steep-sided valley running north to south with a string of

hammer ponds in the bottom.

It is about the finest site you could imagine for a woodland garden, since the soil is moderately acid and each side of the valley gets an equal amount of sunlight. There are two houses, both at the top of the valley on the west side. They are more or less in the middle of the garden and have magnificent views

Leonardslee is particularly famous for its rhododendrons (many raised there), azaleas, camellias, magnolias and coniferous trees. But it grows an immense variety of trees and shrubs, including hardy palms which were planted by a previous owner. Nearly everything flourished and the garden has sometimes been used for filming stories requiring a subtropical setting. But this very luxuriance threatened to destroy it, and Loder says it was saved by the great gale of

of growth. But that was never attempted there; in any case, there was also the problem of getting felling permission for supposedly valuable trees. As a result, the garden became choked. The outer areas were abandoned as being too dense and the original 200 acres was

Matters probably would have continued like this had it not been for the gale. It toppled thousands of trees and, in order to get them out, many more were removed. The clearance is now completed, replanting (where necessary) is well under way, and Leonardslee is a transformed place.

Most of the plants are responding by growing and flowering more freely than before. It is, of course, the extra light and the reduced competition for water and food that have made the difference. for every gardener. Naturally, there are immediate problems of daily maintenance, since there is a greater growth of grass plus brambles and other weeds. But Leonardslee has the answers - wallabies and deer.

Wallabies were introduced more than 100 years ago and are naturalised completely. They are particularly fond of brambles. The deer used to be kept out of Leonardslee by its fences; but when these had to be replaced after the great gale, it was decided to change policy and bring in herds of sika and fallow deer to help the wallables in controlling grass

The results have been highly successful and the cost savings significant. In addition, the animals are proving a great attraction to the 50,000 people who visit Leonardslee each

But there is plenty of new planting to attract them, too, including rhododendrons. Many of these are yakushimanum hybrids, which are dwarf and of particular interest to owners of small gardens. And there is a new bank of hydrangeas which flower in the summer and will link up with the autumn foliage for which Leonardslee

A year ago, Loder persuaded the Sussex Bonsai Group to bring a large demonstration of its art to Leonardslee on permanent loan, and this is now installed near the restaurant and cafeteria. Nearby, a big greenhouse has been turned into an alpine house containing rock plants arranged in their natural families. There are also a new visitors' centre and gift shop.

For the first time, Leonardslee is to be open continuously from April until October 31. In April and June, the hours are 10-6 daily; in May, 10-8 daily. From July to October, the garden is open 2-6 Monday to Friday, and 10-6 Saturday and Sunday. There is to be a special demonstration of bonsai on May 9 and 10.

Robin Lane-Fox reports from the front lawn

OR THE first time in three years, the weather is favouring late planters. The sequence of dry springs has broken; frosts have not been erratic; the ground is warming without becoming hard. It is all an incentive to buy and plant, but before you pitch in, reflect on my report from the front line.

The front line, as usual, is littered with casualties. I blame them not so much on frost as on a winter of cold winds. In the Cotswolds, they include almost anything of marginal hardiness which went unprotected: the better sorts of cistus, the riskier forms of penstemon and anything with silky silver leaves.

As I exhume corpses, I notice warning to planters: despite appearances, these casualties have hardly ever crept out of their original ball of compost during four or five years in the open ground. The top growth, even the flowers, were promising, but something deterred the roots from spreading far and wide.

I have no doubt about the culprit: it is the sad apology for earth in which most of our nurseries now grow on their stock. Most of this compost is peat; some of it is white perlite; none of it is plain loam of the robust variety which these plants then meet in the garden. It is as if the roots emerge from a light cocoon and then go on strike when they encounter reality on three sides. Corpse upon corose shows the same effect which has not killed them, but has certainly slowed

You and I have to learn to live with it because nursery-men are not likely to change their convenient ways. These light composts are easy to buy, transport, force-feed and keep clean: innocent customers are now accustomed to them and there are only a few eccentrics like myself who prefer to buy "open ground" plants with bare roots and a dead appearance in late winter. We are all told that it is marvellously easy nowadays to plant anything from a container at any time of the year; we hear much less about the difficulty of persuading plants inside grow on smoothly.

My first cure for the difficulty is water. Much of our newly-bought stock is planted out when it is already too dry. The compost in plastic containers tends to dry out on a warm shopping day in the garden centre and dry out even more drastically in the car boot.

I have just been planting a group of pot-grown box bushes: here, there is the added complication that their fibrous roots are already a tangled mass and the only way of wetting this muddle is to stand the entire ball of roots for an hour or two in a bucket of water. Casual watering from a can merely runs down the outer sides of the root ball and reaches nothing: the plant goes into the ground with a dry centre and is not saved by most people's habit of watering gently round the plant, not directly at its centre.

If you are planting during this weekend, ignore the trivial distraction of any rain and keep a bucket nearby in which to immerse each subject which comes equipped with its own designer-compost

The next step is to loosen the ground to as fine a texture as possible immediately around the new ball of roots. On a clay soil, you will have to have a second bucket of a light, leafy compost to hand in order to add to this workable zone round your new acquisition. Labels will probably tell you to plant your pot-grown purchase in yet more peat, but I rebel against correcting the culprit by using yet more of it and I do not find that another handful solves the problem. Sooner or later, the roots have to be persuaded to explore your local quickly if you avoid the amateur's other great mistake. Whenever you plant, you must make a hole which is deep enough for the job. Except on heavy soils, the level of the ground will always settle round newly-planted stock and beginners will be caught out and find their plants protruding above ground level like corks in a half-opened bottle. It is extremely difficult to plant too deeply unless you are handling roses or larger shrubs which have been grafted: here, you should not bury the plant below the point of grafting unless you want endless suckers. Otherwise, you must allow for the surrounding soil to setif you are to persuade the upper tangle of roots to leave their nursery home. The more I see newly-planted borders, the more I realise how people do not realise this fact.

It is not only important to plant deeply: it is absolutely vital that you give a plant enough width. There are two great popular fallacies about roots. One is that they some-how eat the surrounding soil and its goodness. Of course they do nothing of the sort. They are enabled to take up goodness from it by moisture: they are incorrigible drinkers, not eaters.

roots move around. Again they mostly do no such thing Existing roots stay exactly where you have finally planted them, or squashed them with out noticing while treading or the soil as you fill up the hole They then grow outwards, it you are lucky, from the tangled position in which you have left them.

Once you understand these two fallacies you can see the importance of my advice Watering allows your plant to pick up goodness: I totally mis-trust scientists who tell us in the early stages of a drought that there is no need to water anything. The advice emphatically does not apply to newlybought and planted goods.

As roots cannot move, you must be sure to space them out and tease them to a full, straight length when setting them first into the ground. It they are hideously tangled and impacted at the bottom of a pot, loosen them by pulling them gently sideways and not fussing too much if some are torn in the process. You have to break the circle if they are not to go round and round on

Finally, watch out for plants which are all top-growth and no bottom, let alone a tangled ball of roots. They will be appearing by the hundred in garden centres during the next month because plants in a onelitre size look much more promising and fetch a higher price than smaller versions in 9 cm squares of polythene.

The trouble is that many of the apparent litre-sized varieties were only nine centimetre plants a week or two ago. They have been over-potted, frequently in the sort of non-compost which persuades halfhearted gardeners that there is absolutely no chance of meeting anything so undesirable as a worm. Investigate gently below the surface to be sure that your chosen plant is well rooted and is not still rolling around in a bed which is too big for it.

The litre size will cost you up to half as much again, so you want to be sure that the extra value is there. If it is, I like to calculate that I can divide one of these bigger smaller ones, shake off the use less compost and grow them on in my own soil in a special corner until next autumn. This practice gives you several plants for the price of one and allows you to break them gently into local conditions. At this late stage, if you want an instant border, sow hardy annuals or buy some of the more bearable varieties of dahlia - which really do exist. Do not believe that you will make it in three months from a mass of container-grown purchases, brought back from a display unit in a burst of postelectoral confidence.

CENTURY ago. Norway was the place for the moneyed angler seeking something out of the ordinary. For a time, in the 1920s and 1930s, Sweden, and in particular the River Em, where the giant sea trout ran, was the place to be seen. Later still Alaska and Canada held sway. although Iceland had its enthusiasts. But now now there is only one wilderness which the fashion-conscious fisherman need bother with - Russia

The sporting possibilities revealed in the wreckage of the Soviet Union have been hungrily seized upon by specialist travel companies. So far, attention has been focused on the salmon rivers of the Kola peninsular, which thrusts itself like a thumb into the Barents Sea north east of St Petersburg. The reports are of great Already the frontiers are being pushed further back. I see that one company is offer ing trips to Kamchatka, with the promise of Pacific salmon.

Another invites you to join what it calls a research fishing trip to somewhere called Yakutia, in Siberia, where sturgeon may be caught. I am afraid that I have no first-hand experience. I was offered the chance to go to Kola last year, but decided that ten days in the treeless, mosquito-infested tundra, pulling out salmon as fast as I could and putting them back again (catch-and-release is accepted practice) might not be as much fun as it first appeared. There was also - I confess it with shame - a nagging fear that I might not pull anything out, and that reputation and self-esteem might suffer.

However, although I have not fished in Russia myself, I have before me an entertaining account from one who has -although his experiences are a far cry from those glowingly advertised by Messrs Aber-crombie and Kent and the rest. cromone and Kent and the rest.

I met Marius-Adrian Dumitru
His exceedingly pretty wife became firm friends. Last autumn, he travelled to St Petersburg as a guest of the city's Anglers' and Hunters' Association. His description begins arrestingly: "Number-runs of salmon, and sport of a less are the rivers and lakes of the great Russian taiga, but how to reach them?" Certainly, many people reached them. and some of them for ever. Marius found the Russians a very hospitable people. "I was assailed", he writes, "with real delicatessen richly aspersed with the never-failing vodka."

He also found his hosts entirely ignorant on matters of fly-fishing. On the River Vilojba - about 200 miles east of St Petersburg - Marius was able to show the Russians

From the Vilojba, Marius travelled north, to Karelia and the lake of Ladoga. He met a Romanian girl, Roxana. "She proved to be my fairy as, after a whole week of endless rain, I finally had a wonderful autumn day. We crossed dark fir tree forests, past rivers and clear lakes, towards our desti-Ladoga is celebrated, apparently, for a species of trout called the Kumja, which grows to 15lb and more. But Marius concentrated on another fish: "Above me, thousands of ephemerids flew incessantly, and the grayling came to the surface to take my forgeries. When the setting sun length-ened the shadows of the trees over the lake, I felt a fish hang heavy on the end of my line. It was sixteen inches long - perhaps one and a half pounds. Then the rain came down

Perversely, perhaps, I find this sort of thing more conge-nial to my imagination than the thought of ten days of salmon plunder in Kola. I would love to wander the streams that feed Ladoga. I could be lured to the lakes of Armenia, or to mighty Baikal. Kamchatka sounds a little chilly, and as I cannot find Yakutia on the map, I will have to reserve judgment. One place I am very keen on at the moment is Outer Mongolia. The other day, leafing through a 65-year-old copy of tograph of a Mr V. de Franck, holding a vast fish, a taimen of 58lb. Of the taimen I know no more than that it is a relative of the salmon, de Franck describes it as a grim and vicious fighter, and since he caught 37 of them on a two week trip, I am prepared to take his word for it.

The river on which he enjoyed this sport was the Gan, whose limpid waters he says - flow from the Hingan Mountains across the plain of the North Barga. I have been unable to find the Gan, or the town of Kantagaitu (The Elks Are Here, in English), where he staved. But the Argun into which the Gan flows forms the border between Russia and China, so it must be on one side or the other.

de Franck says: "This territory is 100 per cent safe from the Chinese brigands who infest other parts of North Manchu ria and have closed many promising fishing and shooting grounds to the sportsman."
What more do I need to know? I have always wanted to be an authority on something.

Why not the Manchurian, or

nist? Satirist? Wise man? Nothing quite works but it is at least clear the philosophes were not philosophers pure and simple, in the sense that they formulated a complete system of thought. In this respect they are not like, say, Descartes, Locke or Hume; yet to understand their work in any kind of depth you have to engage with a great deal of hard-core philosophical argument. Their most cogent British interpreters have tended to be professional philosophers or political scientists, Ayer on Voltaire (1986) and Cranston on Rousseau - in a major biography of which the final volume is still awaited. P.N. Furbank is the exception in that he is a literary critic and biographer with previous books on EM Forster, Samuel Butler and Italo Svevo to his credit. Yet happily Furbank is more than capable of presenting with clarity the main philosophical issues that abound in the work of Diderot. The sub-title - "a critical biography" – is here an exact description of the book. Furbank deals comprehensively with the life and the work of this libera-

Diderot, son of a cutler, was a wonderfully entertaining, radically subversive genius. He was, above all, brave; never afraid to risk his neck in publicly proclaiming his violently anti-clerical views with immense vigour in spite of having suffered a period of barsh imprisonment in his youth on account of them. If Diderot is best known to us as the architect of the Encyclopédie. as an early champion of the notion of the Tree of Knowledge, and more generally as a protagonist of the Enlightenment (a term about which this book has some sharply corrective things to say), we are reminded by Furbank that Diderot's total output also included many polemical essays and treatises, regular art criticism, pieces of theatre, and some brilliant fictional dialogues.

A sense of virtuosic performance typifies Diderot's life as much as it did his work. He was greatly in demand socially, and would entrance his contemporaries by his flow of sparkling discourse even when he was embattled in furious argument with them. He had long love-hate relations with both Rouss-eau and Voltaire, less stormy ones with his other collaborators on the Encyclopedia, D'Alembert, Holbach, Naigeon, and with Baron Grimm (not to be confused with the folk-lorists of the same name). One of Diderot's greatest fans was Catherine the Great, who supported him financially for much of his career and persuaded him at an advanced age to go to St Petersburg as her adviser on how to run her empire; though she does not seem to have acted on his voluminous advice.

Furbank paints vivid portraits of Diderot's shrewish wife, Nanette, and of his intellectual mistress. Sophie Volland. Diderot was torn apart like any typical honnête homme or père de famille in a boulevard farce. Unlike Rousseau he accepted the burden of parenthood but did not allow it to impair his career. Nothing in his life ever could or did. He was unceasingly industrious. His surviving child married a businessman who pros-pered and she provided Diderot with two grandchildren upon whom

also wrote the earliest life of Diderot.

Furbank places Dideror's novels within the tradition of European fiction in the 18th century and high-lights their relevance and readabil-ity today. This is his most useful service for the lay reader. He draws an interesting distinction between novelists like Jane Austen, Balzac and Dickens, and many other mainstream writers of fiction, who rely on giving their readers an illusion of reality, and those like Diderot who practise a kind of deception or con trick on them. In Diderot the reader is deceived into believing that the events described actually occurred. Diderot much admired the work of Richardson, where this kind of deceptive technique is apparent in the way the events of the novel are viewed at one remove through a sequence of authentic-seeming letters, all of them carefully dated.

Diderot's deceptions took many devious forms. His novel about the horrors of conventual life, The Nun, derived from a case of an unwanted illegitimate female child who was forced to take nun's vows at the age of 16, and then when she had grown self-awareness found it impossible to renounce them. In other instances, too, Diderot grafted the fiction onto an episode in the life of a known individual. The composer Rameau, for example, happened to composer and a lavabout. In his fable Rameau's Nephew Diderot takes him as an example of the social parasite and engages with him in a dialogue that examines the role of genius in society. In D'Alem-

The obscurity nowadays of the real people deployed by Diderot in such works has prevented them reaching many British readers outside the universities. If we are ignorant of the French paval officer Louis-Antoine de Bougainville, who in 1771 wrote an account of a Voyage around the world (except per-haps through the purple plant named after him), why should we read Diderot's Supplément to that Voyage? Yet the Supplément is a masterpiece of irony, hilariously arguing the case for polygamy and the economic virtues inherent in a state of nature.

These strategies of deception also include direct addresses to the reader whom Diderot invites to join in the argument. His most elaborate performance of this kind was the posthumous Jacques the Fatalist, to which Furbank devotes a concluding chapter. It is a book that defies summary, a running dialogue inverting the relations between master and servant; in part a par-ody of Cervantes, also an essay on determinism, and a landmark in the history of the anti-novel. It appeared in a readable English translation in the Penguin classics in 1986. After Furbank it should acquire many more British admir-greatly troubled by the initial response from scholars and men of letters to his proposal in 1832 that he produce a work on fairy tales. Wasn't such a thing beneath the dignity of a great literary man such as himself? The consequence was that he it "a neat thing" that would be "obnoxious to ridicule". This story is told in the preface to a book entitled The Classic Fairy Tales, published almost 20 years ago by Iona and Peter Opie. fear of the dark; the fear of monsters; the fear of feeling helpless and small in a world of giants. Somehow his illustrations managed to tame, nor-malise, and even to domesticate such anxieties. You might even say that he was at one with all those efforts that have been made in the 20th century by psychoanalysis, surrealism and much else - to bring about a fruitful, healing accommodation between the world of fantasy and everyday reality. The new book has a curious history. The Opies gathered these rhymes in the immediate aftermath of the Second World War, and the collection was published in a small, limited edition - paper was strictly rationed in those days. One copy alone survived from that printing, tucked away in the back of a cupboard. Forty years later it was rediscovered and shown to Maurice Sendak

This collection of 170 rhymes is subtitled "The schoolchild's pocket book" and it is indeed a vade mecum, a book for all occasions, zestful, humorous, but also savage and macabre. There are rhymes of insult and retaliation; rhymes of teasing and repartee; counting rhymes, skipping rhymes; tongue twisters, riddles and general teasers; lashings of nonsense and bamboozling circular narra-

Sendak has illustrated it in zestful colour throughout, enthusiastically filling up every available inch of blank space with illustrations small, medium and large - squawling babies; shricking maids in mob caps; horned ogres with vast, cavernous mouths; leaping dogs and cavorting donkeys; and everywhere, those rumbustious children in rags and tatters and big top hats, fleeing, skipping, jumping, cartwheeling off the edge of the page. There are as many different kinds and style of illustration as there are subjects to match and fishes in the

What never fails to charm and surprise us about the collection itself is the fact that there is such a demonstrable continuity between past and present. Among the nonsense verses we find the following familiar lines, for example: One fine day in the middle of the night / Two dead men got up to fight / A blind man came to see fair play / A dumb man came to shout burray.

A note to the rhyme informs us that this is one of the oldest forms of nonsense, and then goes on to cite an amusement that was jotted down in the notebook of a minstrel in 1480. The translation reads as follows: I saw three headless (men) / playing at ball / A handless man served / them all While three mouthless (men) sang and howled / Three legless (men) / drove them away... Rhymes may die for whole generations, it seems, then mysteriously reappear in a slightly modified form elsewhere. Like the thistles in Ted Hughes's fine poem of that name, they come fighting back over the same ground, vigorous as ever. In this book, they are part of the schoolchild's armoury - a way of overcoming fear and embarrassment, a magical means of incapacitating the school bully with mere words. And mere words, of course, endure.

ONCE saw a notice in a London bus explaining scheduling changes which concluded with the words, "So the buses run smoother, and there are less delays". To purists this sen-tence is a ghastly example of the quasi-illiteracy which besets our culture. To the more liberal-minded, it is an example of desirable simplification in the direction of demotic forms. How might the quarrel between purist and liberal be decided? The purist will say, "The writer of this notice IMAGES OF ENGLISH ignored logic. He was talking of bus services, not tyres, so it is not the buses but the services which run more smoothly, and that is why he must use the comparative. adverb 'more smoothly', not the comparative adjective 'smoother', because it is the verb 'run' which is being qualified, not the noun 'buses'. Moreover, it is either 'less delay' or 'fewer delays' but not 'less delays', since in the plural

the word 'delay' is a count noun not a mass term." Liberals will respond by saying that the original sentence is all that matters. Purists might defend nice distinctions and aesthetics, but liberals are unpersuaded: speakers, they argue, wish to communicate, and whatever serves them is good English.

At least one thing is clear as long as language exists, it will change; and change will always provoke complaint. Among the targets in Richard Bailey's book are the complainers. He attacks them for wishing to preserve English in literary aspics of one flavour or another, and he also attacks those who think English is preeminent among languages, an attitude which arose with Empire and has accompanied

worst excesses of Englishspeakers' snobbery, colonialism, and self-aggrandisement. The official alm of Bailey's book is to give a "cultural history of English"; its real aim is to expose and debunk Englishspeakers' pretensions.

If Bailey were just another commentator these aims would seem merely partisan contributions to the familiar purist-liberal quarrel. But he is an associate editor of the forthcoming English Language, and there is Anglicize them in ... language, something significant about a as well as otherwise." Professor of English, engaged in authoritative research, so clearly setting out a reductive view of the place and importance of the English language.

Bailey begins with a surprising fact: that the number of people regularly using English in their daily lives is only 15 per cent of the world's popula-tion, and declining. The belief that English is an international language and still growing in importance may bolster English-speaking egos, but its hold on this role is slipping, according to Bailey, not just because Japanese, German and Chinese are growing in impor-tance, as a result of economic. influence and sheer numbers, but because English itself is fragmenting into many variets, some already unintelligible to the mainstream. By extensive use of quota-tion Bailey shows bow English first captured the British Isles and then, after an uncomfortable start without settled spelling and grammar, began to impose itself abroad through colonialism. The attitude of Cotton Mather, the 17th century American colonist and divine: typical, he resisted the idea of an Indian edition of the Bible on the ground that "It is very sure, that the best thing claims about the supposed damaging tendencies of slang, neologisms and jargon. At the same date as the Book of Common Prayer - that exquisite jewel of the tongue was being compiled, John Evelyn complained of English's corruption by "pedantry of schooles, affectation of travellers, translations, fancy and style of Court, servility and mincing of citizens, pulpits, political remonstrances, theatres, shopps, &c." Today the causes of linguistic decay are cited as television, poor education. advertising, computer jargon, and the argot of youth culture. Bailey's view is that the language never decays; it merely changes.

This is true, and change is irresistible. But Balley leaves two large points unconsidered. First, standards may change, but they exist nevertheless. At every point in its history there has been good and had English of the day, and we need to grasp the difference. And secondly, a language is as great as its literature; all the world's great languages are among the first. Taking this into account might have influenced some of Bailey's

The losers' champion

"FOR FIVE centuries," writes Roland Wright, "we have listened only to the history of the winners." Stolen Continents redresses the balance by portraying the European "discovery" of the continents of North and South America from a "native" perspective.

In selecting the Aztecs, Mayas, Incas, Iroquois and Cherokee, he has focused on the most complex societies for whom the greatest source material is available. "The five I have chosen must therefore stand for the many who will never tell their stories because they are extinct. The silence of the Caribbean Taino, the Newfoundland Beothuk, and the Ona of Tierra del Fuego is the most terrible eloquence of all."

Wright portrays the history of these five groupings during three phases: invasion, resistance, rebirth. The book is year marks the 500th anniversary of Columbus's first voyage Michael Glover across the Atlantic, but rors really happened.

Wright sees the superior European attitude towards the 'primitive" natives as almost laughable were the consequences not so tragic. The "Requirement" read by the sixteenth-century Spaniards to the local people at each encounter demanded they submit to God, the Pope and the Church. "And if you do not do this... with the help of God I shall come mightily against you, and I shall make war on you everywhere . . . and I shall do all the evil and damage to you that I am able. And insist that the deaths and destruction that result from this will be your fault." This "shabby document", as Wright points out, was a symbolic necessity to justify outright plunder. The Indians understood neither its meaning nor its intent. Apologists for the European "invasion" rightly point out that what decimated the local people was not so much war-fare but European diseases. But Wright stresses the couse-

Although the title of the book indicates that the continents of North and South America have been "stolen" from their pre-Columbian inhabitants, the reader is left in no doubt that 500 years later the "theft" is still being contested by those who have not lost sight of their ancient culture or language. "If Guatemala really had majority rule, it would be a Maya republic," says Wright. In the Andes 12m people speak the inca language. There are more Iroquois ... living in North America than

YRONIC memoirs are becoming a new literary genre. Lord Byron's Doctor first appeared in the US in 1989, the same year that Robert Nye's Memoirs of Lord Byron came out here. Mab's Daughters, by the Shelleyean academic Judith Chernaik, added the female points of view, with imagined extracts from the diaries of four of the women in

The odd thing is that these imaginative monologues, taking off from the same sparse facts, do not contradict each other, but weigh in with accumulative effect. And yet, such is the power of Paul West's achievement, one starts to feel sympathy for the derided outsider, so far out of his depth. So great is his self obsession that information about his companions is incidental. Byron's publisher, John Murbut on receiving the document asked: "You did go with Lord Byron, did you not? I do not find him here." Paul West's Polidori has the same shortcoming, and yet holds our interest as a convincing and disturbing portrait of one of history's losers.

OBERT KEY, David Mellor's number two at the Ministry of National Heritage, performed badly – platitudes galore - at his first appearance before the arts community on Thursday night at the National Art Collections Fund Awards ceremony. Sir Nigel Mobbs, chairman of Slough Estates, sponsors of the event, summed up the reaction by calling for more money for the arts — and fewer platitudes. He spoilt his case by announcing that, after six years, Slough was withdrawing its sponsorship.

The Awards were the swansong for Sir Peter Wakefield, who is retiring as director of the NACF. He leaves an impressive record - a trebling of the membership to 35,000 and a rise from £300,000 to £2m a year in NACF's contributions to save works of art for the nation.

The crassest decision of his civil servants when he was at the Treasury was to cheesepare over the commissioning of art to set off the £450m building. Since this is the most expensive national monument of the century, mooted at one time as Margaret Thatcher's permanent memorial, there is a case for spending a full 1 per cent of the building costs on art. With £45m; you could have created something to put all the recent Parisian monuments in the shade. Instead a miserly sum was earmarked - and then with-drawn, even though artists like R.B. Kitaj and Eduardo Paolozzi had been commissioned to produce a huge tapestry and a large sculpture. The Library was told to raise the money for art from sponsorship, a time-consuming task in a recession, and hardly its first priority. Now Mellor can make good his lapse. He scheme has emerged which should tempt a sponsor to find the £250,000 needed for the Paolozzi monument The sculptor has agreed to give the sponsor a free second casting of his 12ft high sculpture, which is inspired by Newton. To make such an offer irresistible there are other benefits - the sponsor will be immortalised by having their name inscribed on the plinth; receive an invitation to next year's opening by the Queen; and doubt less qualify for a tax benefit. A final incentive is that a recent Paolozzi sculpture has just been insured for £1m. Such a commercial deal to dress up a national monument should be enough to embarrass the Government into action.

The phone has hardly stopped ringing at Sotheby's since it wrote to members of Lloyds last week reminding them that, to ease their current financial woes, they might like to cash in their art collections. Some felt that the auction house was taking on the character of a vulture, feeding off the discomfiture of hard-pressed Names. in the event, the offer of a free

the promise of a cash advance of a third of Sotheby's valuation if the owner felt obliged to sell at auction, struck a chord. There have been more than 50 calls, with the first valuation taking place today. Sotheby's has been surprised at the quality of the antiques, which

GLYNDEBOURNE opens next Saturday with a new production of Peter Grimes. And for once, this most traditional of English Festivals will be different. Not as different as next year, when there will be no Festival at all, nor as 1994, when the audience will gather on May 28 for The Marriage of Figuro in a new £33m auditorium, in a new Glyndebourne. But different enough. Since last August, Glyndebourne has been a building site. The development has stormed ahead. The shape of the new theatre is clearly visible. The old walled garden and the tennis court have been demolished too. but there has been a temporary reprieve for the auditorium, where this summer Glyndebourne is holding a shortened Festival, starting four weeks earlier to allow for total destruction in August. Apart from the work in progress, which does not impinge on the traditional pleasure grounds, and the possibility of nippy picnics at the early May performances, there is one more change this year. Glyndebourne was unable to find a company prepared to put up £100,000 to sponsor Peter Grimes

It is not too surprised, nor too perturbed. Since launching the appeal for funds to build the new theatre, chairman Sir George Chris-tie has extracted money from big business with a charm and facility unmatched in the history of British artistic philanthropy. In two years, companies have pledged almost £25m - the bulk of the £28m so far raised. The total contributed by sponsorship to performing arts is only £57m a year, such is Glyndebourne's importance as a mecca for culture and hospitality.

And this is just the start. By pledging money now, corporate members earn the privilege of paying yet more money in the future: for annual subscription and the pur-chase of guaranteed tickets.

General director Anthony Whit worth-Jones admits that Glynde-bourne got in just in time, weeks before the recession really began to bite. It has still not achieved its target from the corporate sector, but as the new building shows of its qualities, it hopes to should round up the backsliders.

Although the facts of life force the Festival to embrace the corporate sector, they keep it firmly in its place. The new theatre adds 320 seats, making 1,150, but businessmen will be confined to 35 per cent, with the bulk, around 50 per cent, going to individual members, and the remainder to the general public. And there will be cheap standing places at every performance. Glyndebourne is not nearly as exclusive as its reputation suggests. There are still a few May tickets going for speedy callers.

RE PAST has always come to us neatly packaged. Give history enough time and it will reduce itself, as all schoolboys know, to a grab-bag of dates, political milestones and rhyming mnemonics

("Willy, Willy, Harry, Steve").
The remarkable thing about cinema history is that, unlike real history, it has been neat and simple: at least until now. 99 out of 100 films were made to a certain length and shown at that length. They had no life beyond the cinema, so there was no call for longer TV/video versions aimed at the miniseries market or shorter TV/ video versions aimed at turning epics into teledramas. In addition, the studio era kept the director's ego on a leash, deterring him from crying "Foul" if his film left the cutting-room minus his favourite scenes.

Today all is different. Multiplying delivery systems and declarations of war by harddone directors make the modern feature film the world's most frighteningly elastic work of art.

When a film is not actually born in two distinct versions as recently in Rivette's 4-hour La Belle Noiseuse twin-packed with a 2-hour "Divertimento" it can have a delayed rebirth as that increasingly voguish phenomenon, the "director's ver-

Bygone film-makers such as D.W. Griffith. Abel Gance and Erich Von Stroheim all faced the curse of the scissors from censors or studios. But they, unlike their descendants, could seldom combat the finality of the release version. Today, TV and video allow a director a second or third bite at the cherry of artistic perfection. Result: a world at once saner and madder. The awareness of expanded options liberates the director. But it also allows him to bewilder audiences by treating his film as an "work in progress". This phrase has become a mantra of modern cinema. When two famous films were submitted to the Cannes Film Festival in different years asworks-in-progress and won the Golden Palm - Apocatypse Now and The Mission - festival-goers rightly protested that they were being treated as sneak preview audiences. Either the film was ready to the director's satisfaction or it was not. If not, it should wait for another

But then the sneak preview itself has assumed a special role in the age of the flexi-film. Is a movie ready when the director says so? Or when the studio says so? of the work. ome cinephiles today would claim that that fluidity has always existed in film: that the finite nature even of past works of cinema is illusory. Scholars and restorers such as Britain's Kevin Brownlow (Napoleon) and America's Robert Harris (Lawrence Of Arabia) earn a living from regarding old movies too as being in a state of perpetual evolution. But even these men tend to have a guiding light to move towards: that inspirational concept of "the director's intention". We are fast entering an age, though, when this concept, too, is exposed as unsound. It supposes not only that the director had an intention - debatable in the hurly-burly of most filmmaking - but that the director is the highest reference point and authority. Is he?

One could argue that the true author of a successful commercial film is the studio that first packaged the ingredi-ents, or the star who lovingly nursed the project as his next career move, or the screenwriter who put pen to paper, or

The play cost a penny for the groundlings in the yard, and seats in the galleries were two pence. Broken piggy banks from the 1988-89 dig in the Rose Theatre in Southwark are an evocative part of a newly opened permanent display of Tudor and Stuart theatres in the Museum of London. The Rose, over the road from the FT's building, was at the heart of theatreland in the days of Marlowe and Shakespeare. Across Park Street was the Globe. Nearby were the Swan and the Hope, and the Bear Garden for bear baiting. London's first theatre was The Theatre, built by James Burbage in 1576 in Shoreditch, beyond the rule of the City fathers. Similarly, Philip Henslowe put the Rose in Southwark in 1587. In 1599 Burbage demolished The Theatre and came south to build the Globe and start a lively rivalry. The Globe/Shakespeare players in Hamlet parody the Rose/

Marlowe style of acting. Centrepiece of the new display is a metre-high model of the Rose incorporating the results of the dig, which con-firm details Henslowe recorded in his diaries.

The model includes the refreshment parlour that Henslowe's partner, the grocer John Cholmley, ran beside the Rose. A sword hilt and scabbard from the dig are rusty relics of many a swordplay. But missing from the display are the hazelnuts, which were those days' chocolates and popcorn. Both Rose and Globe digs produced masses of them. At the Globe, the Museum of London has finished supplementary bore hole digs beneath the cellars of Anchor Terrace, paid for by the site's owner, Hanson, finding more of the theatre's perimeter. Now Hanson and the Museum are preparing a proposal for the future of the site. What a chance for the new French style National Heritage Secretary to promote a French-style solution, a total excavation of the Globe - even if it means removing the lower floors of Anchor Terrace - to learn how Shakespeare was played in the theatre he wrote for. Bore holes are not enough.

Howard Barker's A Hard Heart was repeated on Tuesday on Radio 3. I wrote about it a month ago, but I mention it now because Radio 3 is only to have one play a week after the Proms. This seems to me idiotic, for this is where the best of the new drama is usually presented or repeated, and a new Radio 3 drama editor, Jeremy Howe, has only lately

In the Radio Authority's complaints bulletin for January to March, only seven complaints out of 40 are based on political bias - four from the Andrew Neil programme on LBC, only one of them upheld. (Two other biases dealt with hunting and with fighting in Israel.) This was a fair record in the quarter before the election.

Forty programming complaints were sorted under five heads - bias, accuracy, taste and broken undertakings, together with six miscella neous. Nine altogether were upheld by the Authority. whose reports, and subsequent reference to the stations concerned, seem notably sensible - especially in view of the frivolity of some of the complaints, such as dislike of music policy or lokes that might offend lesbians".

The advertising complaints tend to be pretty trivial. If a phrase like "Columbus discovered America" offends American Indians, they must have been offended ages before North West Airlines got hold of it. Too many complaints are better than too few, though better for listeners, that is, even if they are agony for the Authority.

Records/David Murray Rosenkavalier at length

those who love every note of it, will deny that Der Rosenkavalier is rather too long, vastly too long, some would say. Except with a Baron Ochs of irrepressible geniality - like the late Kurt Böhme - the Act 3 farce soon wears thin, and I know one producer who vowed to delete the entire levée scene from Act 1 if ever he had the chance (luckily, he never did). For all its cultivated virtues, Haitink's new recording ignores the problem, thus bringing the listener face to face with it.

It is no secret that Strauss got carried away, as with almost every libretto he set later. His just-previous operas Salome and Elektra had left him room to expand within a safe one-act compass, but the newly sophisticated, conversational style of Hofmannsthal's three-act Rosenkavalier text tempted him to beedless felicities - beyond the playing-time that the comedy could bear. Afterwards, both creators admitted that. The usual stage solution is to make small cuts. but in recordings that would

It should be enough to remember that it is primarily a romantic comedy (conceived on the lines of a cleverer Fledermaus), not a lachrymose drama, and that during his own lifetime Strauss deplored the tempi at which other conductors liked to draw it out. Though Haitink takes only a couple of minutes longer over each act than Erich Kleiber did in 1954 (Decca 425 950-2: an evergreen tonic) the effect is dishearteningly staid. In the waitz-hullabaloo at the final rout of Baron Ochs, for exam-ple, the orchestral voices regis-are delicately fixed. None of ple, the orchestral voices register superbly - and yet there is hardly a twinkle in its eye, let alone a frank guffaw: it sounds like a majestic interlude.

intriguers) stand out. For serious Straussians, the new recording of his 1938 one-acter Friedenstag ("Day of Peace") - the first ever - is of keener interest. It is an opéra maudit, all but forgotten since the initial performances incurred Nazi disfavour because of its untimely, undisguised pacifism.

A mediaeval Commandant and his forces, besieged in a fortress, are at the end of their resources; despite his loyal wife's yearning for a pacific future, he resolves to blow up the entire town rather than surrender. At what was to be the fatal moment, church bells ring out from everywhere: miraculously, peace has been declared from afar.

The score is stern and single-minded, with touches of Kurt Weill's acerbic style. Only the Wife (Alessandra Marc. best in full cry) is allowed some romantic expansion. For the bleak Commandant, Roger Roloff's baritone is uningratiating but effective, and the many small roles are cast from strength - George Shirley, William Wildermann, Ruben Broitman and Richard Cassilly among them. sympathetic hand.

Some briefer notes on other new recordings of music from the period. With the Chicago Symphony, Neeme Järvi continues his rewarding cycle of Franz Schmidt's symphonies with the "Schubertian" Third. Fresh, eager playing, with the Scherzo at last performed prop-erly up-tempo and to bracing purpose; only Järvi's Adagio is an aberration, treated as an urgent, passionate Andante instead of the dark meditation it really is. The Hindemith Concerto is a surprisingly attractive fill-up.

Among new virtuosi, the pianist Nikolai Demidenko and the very young Siberian violinist Maxim Vengerov have been making extraordinary impressions. Demidenko has often struck me as an eerily detached, chilly artist, but Mediner's music proves to suit him magnificently. The Second Concerto is the less remarkable here, hefty and rather close to Rakhmaninov (a Medtner classmate at the Moscow Concervatoire); the Third, however, is richly original and stirring, and Demidenko is magis-terial with it.

The phenomenal young Vengerov will doubtless make hun dreds more records, in due course. His playing is immacu-late and devoted in the Beethoven and Brahms sonatas on Teldec, but his Russian partner is obtrusive, often distracting - like someone determined to make himself noticed. The concerto record with Mehta is much more fun: gorgeous tone, dazzling feats - you can enjoy amazing guests with Vengerov's fantastic account of the "Carmen" Fantasy.

OST people see the Vikings from the point of view of their victims. The conventional image is of berserk brutes in dragonprowed ships looting towns and burning monasteries. After unleashing a Darwinian struggie for survival among the top families of western Europe, the Viking threat simply petered out; Scandinavia once more became marginal to European

How much more there was to the Vikings is brought home by an extraordinary exhibition in Paris. Les Vikings: Les Sonn dinaves et l'Europe 800-1200 is mounted by the Council of Europe and the Nordic Council of Ministers. With more than 600 items, the majority from Scandinavia, this embarrass-ment of riches is enough to bring even the hardiest visitors to their knees with exhaustion. A folie de Vikings has now gripped the French, fascinated, for example, to discover that they owe the word for lobster, homard, to their Norse perse-cutors. In consequence, visibility in the Grand Palais is not good. The installation is stylish, but the labelling sets a new standard in uninformativeness. I grumble in the hope something can be done when the show moves on.

Fortunately, the catalogue is a wonderful find. Nothing less than an encyclopaedia of the northern world, it is packed with information on everything from Icelandic sagas to the salt-fish trade.

Armed with such a handsome yet unusually portable book, the exhibition's dingiest finds become fascinating. A tatty fragment of 10th-century cloth was once part of billowing, brightly-coloured Viking trousers, rather like a Turkish peasant's. Another wool scrap tells archaeologists that when Vikings were hard-up, they trimmed their jackets with

The sheer quantity of 9th-and 10th-century material is almost beyond belief: skis, carved beds from the famous ship-burials, a tool-box and its contents from Gotland, amulets of amber shaped like Thor's hammer, a bone flute and Pan-pipes from York, and bits of boats.

Swords inscribed in Latin suggest that the Frankish kings' embargo on selling arms to the Vikings was useless unless, of course, it was booty. But there is a mass of evidence in support of the view that the Vikings were traders first, warriors second. I particularly liked a carved stick which was an invoice for a shipment of

The exhibition opens windows on to an unfamiliar northern world. We meet the Faroese, the fiercely pagan Laplanders, and the redoubtable Finnish ladies who were buried with their axes. The Scandinavians' Baltic neighbours also feature memorably; one of the most magnificent sights is the complete sets of Chess No 920: 1 Rxf7+ Nxf7 2 Qxf7+ Kh6 3 Bd3 Qg5 4 f4 ladies' jewellery, complete with cowry shells, from the museum in Riea.

Between 800 and 1100, Viking ambitions spanned almost the entire known world. Gravegoods and caches of buried treasure in their homeland recall the ceaseless forays of warbands, as iar as the coasts of Spain and Morocco, down the Volga to Byzantium (there are Viking graffiti in Haghia Sophia), Syria, and Central Asia. Even so, the mind boggles to think how a 7th-century bronze figurine of Buddha ended up at the Swedish trad-

Patricia Morison reviews the Viking exhibition in Paris

From Canada comes precious testimony to the settlement discovered 30 years ago at L'Anse aux Meadows in Newfoundland. It was not a success, unlike Viking settlements on Iceland, the Duchy of Normandy, and above all, Kiev and the kingdom of Russia.

Equally fascinating are the finds which suggest the civilising process at work. In an idle moment, an 11th-century Dane scratched in runic letters on a cow-bone, "Kyss mik!", "Give us a kiss!". Passing love-notes under the table hardly squares with our image of the ferocious gens Danorum. (After-dinner entertainment for a band of Danish warriors in 869, was to pelt their captive St Edmund, king of East Anglia, to death with the dinner service.)

Christianity transformed the Vikings. Till the mid-10th century - later in Sweden - they were worshippers of Thor and Odin. A 10th-century burial from Denmark contains two skeletons; a young man dressed in imported silk, and an older man, decapitated. It recalls Adam of Bremen's story of the corpses of sacrificial victims hung like pheasants in the grove at Uppsala. The last room contains spectacular artistic proof of what happened once Thor's worshippers had evolved into pilgrims and crusaders. There are wondrous beauties here, such as the carved wooden font from the church of Norre Snede in Jutland, ivory crucifixes made from walrus teeth (an important Scandinavian export) grave stones and furniture, and an graceful iron candelabrum in the shape of a longship.

Just how far the Vikings ha travelled is summed up by a 12th-century shoe from Bergen. Embroidered runes along the top spell out amorvicithomnicoth - a gallant shot at Virgil's Amor vincit omnia, "Love conquers all".

The wooden portal of the church at Hylestad in Denmark shows how delightfully the Viking tradition of interlaced animals married with Romanesque figurative art. It tells the story of Sigurd, alias Siegfried, and the dragon. Precious manuscripts of Snorri Sturiuson's books testify to the intellectual sophistication of clerics who, in writing down the legends of Valhalla, made perhaps the single most influ-ential contribution of Scandinavia to European culture.

Slave of the box office

OURING reveals all too clearly the Jekyli and Hyde tendencies of ballet companies The need, the duty, to take classical dancing to regional audiences is inescapable. The temptation to play horridly safe (an infernal round of Swan Lake and The Nut-cracker) is still Mr Hyde's boxoffice imperative. The voice of conscience urges triple bills, less familiar full-length pieces, and Dr Jekyll faces financial ruin thereby.

Current tours by two Russian troupes - Moscow City Ballet with its feeble Sleeping Beauty, Stars of the Bolshoy with gems from the classics show how familiarity dictates repertory. Northern Ballet Theatre plays solid weeks of Swan Lake; Scottish Ballet offers ceaseless Coppèlias; London City Ballet provides Romeo and Juliet and a classical triple bill. English National Ballet soon embarks on a season of Cinderellas. Even the Birming-ham Royal Ballet must tour Giselle and a programme of one act pieces relying on such securities as Les Sylphides and Elite Syncopations

Companies have so pandered to audience faste; so failed to generate an interest in the new; so homogenised the repertory and the very idea of "ballet" (and their own identities), that any break with proven titles will soon become impossible. Rising costs have helped price ballet out of inventiveness and adventure; a vast and valuable repertory hes unexplored.

Where once small companies as different and differently exciting as Western Theatre Ballet or Walter Gore's troupes, laboured to give programmes unique and enjoyable: and where once the wild and wonderful repertory and glamorous casts of the de Cuevas troupe were guarantees of excitement, astronomical outlay, inadequate subsidy, have produced the cast-iron titles, the atrophied imagination, and the deadly sameness of touring ballet's current programming. Standards vary wildly, and I hold little brief for most of the performances that pass themselves off under illustrious titles - I can think of no more than a dozen ballerinas fit to dance Aurora or Odette/Odilo or Giselle as these roles should be seen, and of even fewer stagings that do honour to the ballets themselves. The Birmingham Royal Ballet Giselle, which I saw on Thursday in Canterbury, remains a careful, well-conceived production - and the Marlowe Theatre offers it a fine stage. The performance was honest - though I thought some of the soloist dancing less than inspiring, and the mime playing looked all-too-predictable — and the evening offered a chance to see a guest with the troupe, Anna Valladolid, born in the Phillipines, now a principal dancer in Munich. Her Giselle was del-icate, most effective amid the mists and mystery of the second act, where her compassion was touchingly sincere. But it was yet another Giselle in the déjà-vu; phenomenon that is Britain's touring ballet scene.

DRIAN Mitchell's Columbus show, A New World and the Tears of the Indians is loosely adapted from a Lope de Vega play, The Discovery of the New World, written about a century after Columbus's voyages: but in proper liberal spirit, Mitchell has set it within Bartholome de las Casas' grim contemporary testimony about the later destruction of Columbus's gentle

"Indians" by the Spaniards. Bartholome's document is just snatchcocked in: a bit by way of prologue, and much more for an epilogue in which It is impossible to divine what writes that "hindsight has Hugh Quarshie's hero may feel pained? defiant? Having smouldered darkly throughout the play (something for which Quarshie has an admired knack), and given nothing that might catch fire, he merely smoulders on.

The director Patrick Sandford and a hard-working multiracial cast do what they can for this half-baked text, in Robin Don's deft, inviting set. Presumably Lope's verse-play was in high epic colour with quaint native vignettes.

In the programme Mitchell made some of his comedy unplayable" (so he has cut it); the royals again.

foresight, however, might have suggested that flat modern-colloquial, like most of Mitchell's language here, would not enhance the drama.

Neither do the amiable little songs scattered through the affair. At what ought be the climactic moments Pete Moser's score tries harder, but an miasma of amateur pageant hangs over the whole thing. We expect Columbus to encounter Ferdinand and Isabella, and later an Atlantic island of San Salvador, and then some natives, and finally

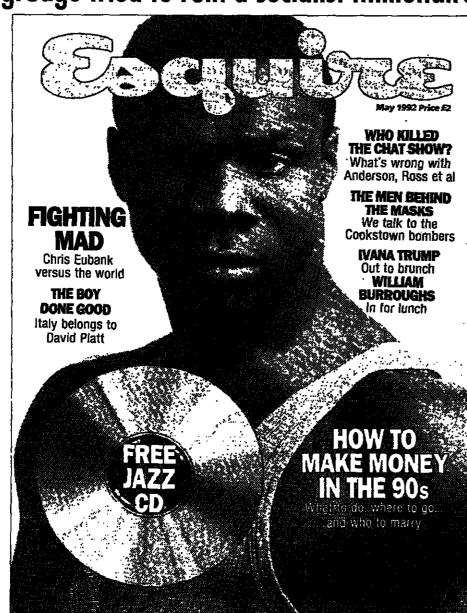

He does; but only the most modest expectations are ful-filled. No discredit to the actors, who may be happy not to be named (some of them can sing well, too). What they have to work with is just too flabby and moony, too thin on character, too vaguely proportioned for the production to get a grip on it. In a loyal, stylish translation, Lope's "popular though chaotic" play might prove considerably less unplayable than this one. It would be bound to be more interesting.

- A 92 With North-South vulnerable North dealt and began the bidding with one no trump, and South replied with three hearts. North rebid three spades, the economic cue-bid, accepting hearts as trumps, and showing the ace of spades South bid four clubs, to which North said four hearts, but when South cue-bid five diamonds, he jumped to six hearts. This ends the auction.

West led the six of spades. Taking with dummy's king, the declarer ruffed the spade seven, crossed to the heart king, and returned to his ace, drawing the trumps. Now he led a diamond to dummy's queen for an indirect finesse, West took with his king, and the declarer made the rest of the tricks. This drew the usual "Well played" from his partner.

South's line of play cannot be condemned, but there is a better line. Let us replay the hand. Winning the spade lead in dummy, declarer ruffs the low spade, cashes king and ace of hearts, and follows with the ace and king of clubs - the queen might drop. It does not, but that is no problem. Declarer now cashes the ace of spades, on which he discards his remaining club. Now comes the key play. The queen of diamonds is led, and finessed. West wins with the king, and is trapped. A diamond return runs into declarer's tenace, a club - if he has one - will set

and a spade concedes a ruff

discard. That is real technique. E.P.C Cotter

May 6.
It bears all the hallmarks of the real thing, although the authorship is in doubt, and it appears to have been drafted a few days before the

Unfortunately, recovery is likely to be slower than my government was recently suggesting might be possible. Because my government declines absolutely and completely even to discuss the possibility of a re-alignment of sterling within the exchange rate mechanism, real interest rates and the exchange rate of the pound will remain intolerably high. Unemployment will therefore carry on rising until at least the end

Members of the House of Commons, this will be a tough spending round. It is already clear that the budget forecast of a PSBR for the

There is no likelihood of any additional funding for public services over the lifetime of this parliament unless growth exceeds the generous forecasts in this year's Red Book.

My government believes that there has been enough radical legislation over the last 13 years. There will be only one major measure in the coming session - a short threeUnion (Abolition of Parliamentary Sovereignty) Bill. Instead, my ministers will get down to the hard graft of implementing the changes already introduced.

My secretary of state for education will send his children to a state school. In another departure from his predecessor's practice, he will also be visiting schools to see what

With the conclusion of the election campaign, there is no longer any need to raise the threat of increased immigration. My government therefore will not reintroduce the Asylum Bill.

ARILYN BROWN'S life changed when her son was arrested in the bustling Tory party activist decided to stand against her own Member of Parliament in this month's British general election.

She polled 119 votes; the official Conservative candidate. Douglas Hurd. Foreign Secretary, retained his Oxfordshire seat with 36,256. But the point was made.

Marilyn Brown accuses the Foreign Office of "disgraceful" failure to support British citizens arrested in other lands. Her verdict is the result of the 16 months her son Nicholas has spent in Reis Magos jail in Panaji, capital of the former Portuguese enclave on India's west-

This is totally beyond any experience I have had in my life before, she told me this week. "I didn't know who to turn to, who to talk to The Foreign Office and Douglas Hurd were the obvious experts. Within six months I began to suspect that their advice was more for the benefit of the Foreign Office than for the benefit of my son."

Mrs Brown conducts her campaign from a modernised cottage, now for sale, in a hamlet so small it does not even merit road signs. The house is full of cats and there are chickens and donkeys in the gar-den. Divorced from Nicholas' father, whom she married at 18, she lives with David Brookes, now her partner in a domestic heating business She was always a Conservative. She laughed ironically. "My ideas have been challenged somewhat. I as a Conservative but I am beginning to wonder if I really am." She has had more support than criticism for her act of political betrayal. "That doesn't surprise me. I always felt that the people I mixed with were nice people first and committed Conservatives second."

Her son Nicholas, now 28, also worked for the business until he set off to see the world after a broken love affair. He settled in India for two years. Riding a friend's motorcycle through Goa in December. 1990, he was stopped by the police. He claims they planted half an ounce of cannabis on him in order to extort a bribe. Since India, with western encouragement, strengthened its drug laws the minimum sentence for possession of this quantity of cannabis is 10 years. Nicholas' trial began last July and has dragged on intermittently ever since. Goa was once a hippy paradise. Today it is an enforcers' paradise. There are several dozen young foreigners languishing in jail. Nicholas Brown's case sounded familiar to me. Six months before his arrest f was stopped, like him, while riding a borrowed motorcycle through the outskirts of Panaji. I refused the three policemen's demand for money, threatened them with the name of my newspaper and was let

"I'm not in the business of getting guilty people off the hook. I am fighting for guilty and innocent alike: everybody has the right to a fair trial. We can't fight for everybody. We can fight for our own citizens."

You are suggesting that British subjects should get British treatment wherever they go in the world. That is not achievable.

'No. But that doesn't stop us trying to achieve it, surely. Otherwise nothing's going to change. The British Government is marvellous about human rights for Kurds, Chinese dissidents, the 'disappeared' in South America, and

For me so far, I realise, it hasn't been particularly challenging. "Now it looks as if I have suddenly been presented with a path to my life that I could never have foreseen. I just cannot turn aside from it, which is quite frightening."

"I wouldn't have thought I am the stuff that campaigners and martyrs are made of. But an area of real, human misery has been revealed and I just cannot turn away from it.

So there are issues here about the civil and military rights of HIV-positive people; about non-discrimination; and about the practical benefits guaranteed (or not) to soldiers who test HIV-positive. Maybe that was what was on the mind of the MP, Harry Cohen, who asked that question back in March 1990.

It is surprising how thoroughly the vision thing is sweeping world affairs. George Bush started it off, of course, but now the vision thing is seeping into every nook and cranny of relatively unsophisticated countries, like Britain. Yesterday morning my agent, Harriet Halfeshare, rang. "Hi, bum-bino." she said. "Sorry I missed lunch last week. I had to dash to

"II you say so, Harriet. But how is my novel doing?"

For the past five months, Harriet has been in possession of a private-eye thriller I completed last year. It is mould-breaking stuff. Chandler updated but with a female private eye who knows how to handle herself but is actually middle class. I mean, she actually owns a Dalmatian. Her sitting room is green. The novel is set in Notting Hill. Also Bond Street, Fes and Beverly Hills. A painting gets stolen, which is thought to be a fake but is actually perfectly genuine. There is a sort of fascist sub-plot. My private eye is sexy. I mean, she's actually postfeminist and is an expert at riet?" "It's the vision thing, bambino. Vision's going mega. How would you like to earn £7,500 writing 1,000 words on vision for one of my clients, the Incorporated Society of London Cinema Owners?" Naturally, I agreed. Last night I faxed them my piece. This is how it started: "In common with Arthur C Clarke, the noted futurologist, we at the Incorporated Society of London Cinema Owners share a vision of how our industry will look in the year 2019. "There will be a plethora of new technologies at work in cinemas of the early 21st century. High-speed, large-screen film processes offering a more realistic viewing experience will be commonplace. Audiences will be engulfed by holographic images in a nerve-tingling experience that will leave them drained and gasping. "Computer-graphic techniques will enable producers to recreate electronically the voices and physical appearances of great stars of yesteryear, so that new movies featuring Greta Garbo, John Wayne, John Travolta, Maggie Smith and other hall-of-famers will be shot in Live-

Sunchro. And movie screens of the early 21st century will see the debut of animatronic actors – humanoids, robots, call them what we will who will play any role, from buffoon to sex siren, at a millifraction of the fee currently charged by the tikes of

"At present, things are not like that. At present, cinema-goers in London have not latched on to the exciting futureworld that lies in

And they expect - demand - to wait many. many months before films on show in America are brought across the Atlantic Popcorn and squalor, That is what they want. That is what we give them.

The US army has found that about one in 600 of those it has tested carry the virus, although admittedly the US does have a far higher general incidence of Aids than the

The US military has taken a tough and open line on this matter. HIV-positive soldiers remain in the army for as long as they are fit for active duties, but they are kept firmly away from sensitive "finger on the button" posts in nuclear weapons commands.

"Not a good place to put someone who knows they are going to die anyway," commented a senior US army medical officer to me recently. For it is a grim fact that sooner or progresses to full-scale Aids and

Surely the British public has a right to know, too? It may not be exactly an election issue, but Britain also has soldiers with their fingers on nuclear buttons, and presumably annual medical check-ups either can or do show who is HIVpositive and who is not.

The man from the MoD hastened to assure me that this policy of silence about Aids did not mean that the British army had no policy at all on the matter - just that it was not prepared to talk about it. Well, let us give the Ministry the benefit of the doubt, while pointing out that the "whose finger on the nuclear button" issue is not the only Aids question that matters in the military context. For example, the armies of the US and Ghana army have both taken later, perhaps as long as 10 years or the view that HIV-positive soldiers more later, the HIV virus inevitably should not be posted abroad. You should not be posted abroad. You can see why. In sensitive political situations, they could easily be accused of wilfully spreading the deadly disease to host and/or invaded countries.

Ghana's efficient professional army, made up of 20-year enlisted men, is a favourite contributor to international peace-keeping forces, as is the Nigerlan army, and it would hardly do if it became known that these peace-carriers were death-carriers also.

Confinement to the mother country also has a deterrent effect against soldiers taking risks over contracting Aids. In the Ghana army, a sure route to promotion is service abroad - and vice versa. Also, service abroad brings with it lucrative foreign allowances, lots of cash, which the HIV-positive man confined to home duties is deprived

It would be good to know whether a similar rule applies to British military personnel. Britain also sends troops abroad, as part of UN forces and for training, including Kenya, where Aids is a serious problem. But apparently the British public is not to know what the rule is: Nor are people to know whether the soldier who is infected by HIV is treated with due respect - that is, in a way that would avoid any charge of discrimination against sufferers.

The US army has a formal policy that an HIV-positive soldier can continue to receive full army medical care and army housing for as long as he (or she, one supposes) is still fit for duties. After that, the soldier is retired on standard retirement benefits; that is, honourably retired.
